PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SEVENTIETH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, January 9, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and everlasting God, who art always more ready to hear than we to pray and art wont to give more than either we desire or deserve, pour down upon us the abundance of Thy mercy and grant to us the spirit to think and do only such things as are right, that we, who can not do anything that is good without Thee, may by Thee be enabled to live according to Thy will, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution adopted by the Pennsylvania Bar Association and ask that it be read by the clerk and appropriately referred.

The resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Pennsylvania Bar Association at a convention held at Bedford Springs, Pa., June 23, 1927

Whereas the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in the year 1826, inaugurated the practice of providing needed revenue for the government of the State by the taxation of inheritances; and

Whereas this practice has been followed by the vast majority of the States of the Union, so that inheritance taxes have become a necessary and important features of the fiscal system of the States; and

Whereas the Federal Government in the past has only entered into the field of estate taxation in war time as an emergency measure; and

Whereas the increasing financial burden upon State governments makes it necessary to conserve every logical source of revenue; and

Whereas the devolution of estates is controlled exclusively by State law: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Pennsylvania Bar Association, taxes on estates or the transfer of property by inheritance should be reserved to the State government, and the Federal Government should now withdraw from this field and leave to the States exclusively this much-needed source of revenue.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives from Pennsylvania in the Congress of the United States, and also to the executive committee of the American Bar Association.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I send to the desk another resolution which I ask may be read and appropriately referred.

The resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Pennsylvania Bar Association at a convention held at Bedford Springs, Pa., June 23, 1927

Whereas there is a growing tendency for the Congress of the United States to appropriate money for various purposes from the National Treasury to the States, on condition that the States will match this appropriation by appropriating an equivalent amount for the same purpose; and

Whereas such appropriations require the Federal Government to impose a heavier burden of taxation upon the citizens of the United States than is required for the purposes of the Federal Government; and

Whereas the policy of appropriating money from the Federal Treasury to the treasuries of the States for specific purposes on condition that an equivalent amount be appropriated by the States for the same purpose constitutes in effect an encroachment by the Federal Government into the constitutional field of the State governments, thereby encouraging by Federal action an expansion of the governmental program of the States in order to entitle the State to receive its share of the Federal appropriation: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That in the judgment of the Pennsylvania Bar Association any expansion of the policy of subsidies from the Federal Government to the States be, and the same is hereby, condemned as opposed to the constitutional organization of government established in the United States and, consequently, prejudicial to the best interests of its citizens.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives from Pennsylvania in the Congress of the United States, and also to the executive committee of the American Bar Association.

Mr. KING presented a resolution adopted by the department of mines and mining, of the Sacramento (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce, protesting against the making of further withdrawals of public lands or any additions to present existing reservations or withdrawals by the Federal Government unless and until Congress shall have included in such withdrawals ample provisions permitting the widest development of the natural resources, including mining, within such areas, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. JOHNSON presented resolutions of the department of mines and mining of the Scramento (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas the acquisition of title to lands bearing deposits of precious minerals in paying quantities is a question of great interest to the industry affected and to the area adjacent thereto; and

Whereas the present existing statutes of Congress and the regulations of the Departments of the Interior and of Agriculture relating to the patenting of such lands are becoming each year more complicated, thus discouraging prospecting and primary development of such deposits; and

Whereas it is possible to greatly simplify the procedure in perfecting title to such mines and deposits and yet fully protect all rights and interests of the United States: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the department of mines and mining of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce, That the act of May 10, 1872, be amended and existing regulations of the Departments of the Interior and Agriculture be modified to provide for a simple and direct procedure for perfecting title by United States patent to mining claims containing precious minerals, and that all statutes of Congress and all regulations of both said departments be so framed as to facilitate the work of obtaining United States patent to such claims and deposits; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Senators JOHNSON and SHORTRIDGE, to Senator TASKER L. ODDIE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Mines and Mining, and to all Representatives in Congress from California, with the request that they use their best efforts to bring about the modifications herein desired.

Approved by the board of directors, Sacramento Chamber of Commerce, November 7, 1927.

A. S. DUDLEY, Secretary.

Mr. WATSON presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Office of the Secretary of State.

I, F. E. Schortemeier, secretary of state of the State of Indiana, hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a full, true, and complete copy of enrolled Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 6 of the seventy-fifth regular session of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, begun on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1927, which said resolution was filed in my office on the 28th day of February, A. D. 1927, as the same appears on file as the law directs, in this office.

[SEAL.] F. E. SCHORTEMEIER,
Secretary of State.

Enrolled Senate Concurrent Resolution 6, requesting the Congress of the United States to appropriate funds to carry out certain recommendations of the Chief of Staff of the United States Army made in furtherance of the national defense act of 1920

Whereas the President of the United States in a recent message to the Congress of the United States has stated that the Army and Navy of the United States should be strengthened, and that a people who neglect their national defense are putting in jeopardy their national honor; and

Whereas, in furtherance of the national defense act of 1920, and amendments thereto, and in order to increase and promote the strength and effectiveness of the Army, the Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States has recommended substantially as follows:

(a) That the Regular Army be brought back to the strength of 150,000 enlisted men and 13,000 officers, and that it be suitably housed and enabled to conduct annual maneuvers on a moderate scale;

(b) That the National Guard be given the support necessary to permit its progressive development toward a strength of 250,000;

(c) That the skeleton organization of the Organized Reserves be adequately maintained;

(d) That all reserve officers receive an average of 15 days' training in each three years;

(e) That the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units be further developed; and

(f) That provision may be made for a gradual increase in the number accommodated annually in citizens' military training camps: Therefore

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the General Assembly of the State of Indiana respectfully and earnestly urges upon the Congress the necessity of appropriating such funds and enacting such legislation as will adequately provide for the effective carrying out of the provisions of the national defense act of 1920 and also the recommendations of the Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States hereinbefore set forth.

SEC. 2. Suitable copies of this resolution shall be sent, by the secretary of state, to the President of the United States, the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and to the members of the congressional Committee on Appropriations and Military Affairs.

F. E. SCHORTEMEIER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Cleveland, Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there has been a bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator DALE, known as Senate bill 1727, and in the House a bill by Congressman LEHLBACH, known as H. R. 25, both bills being identical; and

Whereas these bills provide for a liberalization of the retirement bill for postal and other civil-service employes that was passed by the last Congress to the extent that they ask for voluntary retirement after 30 years of service, and also ask that the annuity be increased from $1,000 to $1,200 per annum; and

Whereas we believe that the requests are just and reasonable and should be granted: Therefore be it

Resolved by the City Council of Cleveland in regular session assembled this 2d day of January, 1928, That we go on record as indorsing Senate bill 1727 and House bill 25, both being known as the Dale-Lehlbach bill, and request the two Senators from Ohio and the three Congressmen from Cleveland to support and vote for the same; and be it further

Resolved, That we instruct the city clerk to send a copy of these resolutions to Senators FRANK B. WILLIS and SIMEON D. FESS, and also to Congressmen THEODORE E. BURTON, CHARLES A. MOONEY, and ROBERT CROSSER.

Adopted January 2, 1928.

I, Fred W. Thomas, clerk of council of the city of Cleveland, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution, file No. 81765, adopted by the council of the city of Cleveland, January 2, 1928.

Witness my hand and seal at Cleveland, Ohio, this 6th day of January, A. D. 1928.

Clerk of Council of the City of Cleveland.
Per CHAS. F. COWELL, Assistant.

Mr. WARREN. I present a resolution signed by the governors of several States, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it is the conviction of the governors and interstate water commissioners and other representatives of the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, the four States of the upper basin of the Colorado River, that the interstate agreement embodied in form by the Colorado River compact as negotiated at Santa Fe, N. Mex., in November, 1922, should be completed and placed in full force and effect through approval and acceptance by the seven Colorado River States, in order that the way may be properly cleared for the orderly development of the Colorado River; and

Whereas substantial progress has been made during the past few months toward the completion of the said compact and negotiations are now being carried on in a competent manner looking to such completion: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the firm belief of the representatives of the four said upper basin States as assembled at Denver, Colo., this 19th day of December, 1927, that no legislation proposing the construction of any project upon the Colorado River should be enacted by Congress, or otherwise authorized by any Federal agency, before the negotiations now in progress have been completed and every reasonable effort exhausted to reach such agreement between the seven States.

FARM LABOR FROM MEXICO

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I send to the desk certain resolutions adopted by different Colorado organizations opposing further restriction of the immigration of Mexican farm labor, and also one from the Colorado State Federation of Labor asking for a continuance of the restriction, and also several letters on the subject. I ask that the resolutions and letters be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolutions and letters were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 3, 1928.

Mr. G. E. COLLISSON,
Manager Denver Chamber of Commerce, Denver, Colo.

DEAR MR. COLLISSON: In reply to your favor of December 30, with the inclosed resolutions, I fully agree with local citizens that it would be most unwise to make any further restriction on immigration from Mexico.

From an agricultural standpoint I believe it necessary to have such labor enter the United States, and have exerted my best efforts to that end ever since coming to Congress.

Recently I called this matter to the personal attention of Secretary Davis, who informed me that the department had not authorized any change in existing regulations on the subject, and I have also taken it up with my colleagues in Congress, urging that no additional legislation be enacted at this time.

Promising to continue my efforts along such lines, and appreciating your interest in the important matter,

Yours sincerely,

LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS.

Resolution

Whereas agricultural production is the biggest factor in the economic welfare of the State of Colorado; and

Whereas the cropping system of all irrigated areas in Colorado includes the growing of some, or all, of the following-named crops, for the cultivation and harvesting of which field hand labor is extensively needed—sugar beets, potatoes, deciduous fruits, cantaloupes, cucumbers, green beans, cabbage, onions, and tomatoes; and

Whereas a maintenance of the present supply of field labor is essential for the support of present agricultural production; and

Whereas Mexican laborers have largely been used for a long period of years to do much of the rough field labor required for the growing of these crops; and

Whereas their services in that connection are satisfactory; and

Whereas many of them return to their homes in Mexico during the winter period; and

Whereas a careful analysis of all social factors related to the use of Mexican farm labor leads to the conclusion that this class of labor is the best now available; and

Whereas there is no visible source of supply of suitable substitute laborers: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Denver Chamber of Commerce is opposed to any modification of existing immigration laws by the Seventieth Congress of the United States of America that would affect the flow of Mexicans back and forth across our border.

Adopted by the board of directors December 30, 1927.

G. E. CASHMAN, Manager.

Resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Fort Collins, Colo.

Whereas it appears that an effort is being made in the Congress of the United States now in session to bring about legislation further restricting the importation of Mexican laborers into the United States to be used during the farming season; and

Whereas various agencies for a long time past have been engaged in getting labor from the various States of the United States to come into this vicinity during the farming season for the purpose of performing hand labor in the growing of sugar beets; and

Whereas it is impossible to obtain sufficient American labor to successfully meet the peak demands for hand labor during the growing season of sugar beets; and

Whereas the past years have demonstrated that the Mexican labor is highly efficient and not competitive with any American laborers, and that it is the best judgment of those engaged in the growing of sugar beets in this community that without the aid of the Mexican hand labor it would be impractical to continue the growing of sugar beets; and

Whereas these Mexican beet laborers are distributed among the farmers of this community and there come in contact with the best class of rural population and receive many benefits beside that purely financial, which results in making these people friendly with the citizens of the United States; and that they largely spend their money where it is made and usually at the end of the season return to their native country to spend the winter months in a climate less rigorous than that in the beet-growing area; and

Whereas the beet-growing industry is of vital importance to the agricultural development of this community and is one of the principal sources of prosperity of the community: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Fort Collins Chamber of Commerce, That we protest against any change of the immigration laws which would tend to restrict or hinder the ability of the beet growers and farmers of this community to secure hand laborers from the citizens of Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge our Senators and Representatives in this Congress to use all honorable means to defeat any measure affecting the immigration laws and consequently affecting the prosperity of our sugar-beet growers; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to both United States Senators and each of the four Representatives in Congress from Colorado.

THE FORT COLLINS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By BYRON ALBERT, President.

GREELEY, COLO., December 8, 1927.

Hon. L. C. PHIPPS, Sr.,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been advised that there is a serious possibility that some action will be taken in the present session of Congress to further restrict Mexican immigration into the United States.

As you no doubt well know, the very existence of the sugar-beet industry of Colorado is dependent upon Mexican labor. This industry requires a great deal of hand labor, and each year serious difficulty is encountered by the farmers of northern Colorado in securing a sufficient number of farm workers. Through long experience, Mexican labor has been found most satisfactory for the work, and only through the fact that this labor could be secured in sufficient quantity has the sugar-beet industry been able to progress.

Many of the Mexicans adapt themselves admirably to local conditions, but many return to Mexico each year and others are absorbed by other industries.

As a result of this condition it is necessary each year to bring into the beet territory several thousand laborers from the outside. This supply can be furnished only by permitting immigration from Mexico, and it is for that reason that we of the sugar-beet territories are very much alarmed over any proposed action that will decrease this very necessary supply.

This letter is sent you as the result of action taken by the board of directors of the chamber of commerce at a regular meeting of the board held Friday, December 2, 1927.

Very sincerely yours,

BOARD OF DIRECTORS, GREELEY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
THOS. M. WELSH, President.
W. M. WILLIAMS, Secretary.

Resolution

Whereas the agricultural development of northern Colorado has resulted in the beet industry becoming the principal interest of northern Colorado to-day, and has put Colorado in the foremost ranks of the sugar-producing States in the United States; and

Whereas our farmers are largely dependent upon Mexican labor immigrated into this country annually as the most valuable help in producing this crop that they have been able to secure; and

Whereas this Mexican labor is seasonable labor which comes and goes with the beet culture, coming into the United States during the period of growing and harvesting of the beet and returning again in large numbers to their native country; and

Whereas if this particular labor immigration should be restricted it would necessitate the Colorado beet-growing farmer securing this help from other sections of the country and would seriously shorten the labor supply in those sections; and

Whereas this labor has been the most satisfactory and most profitable labor that can be secured for this particular industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Longmont Chamber of Commerce, the citizens of Longmont, and the farmers of the trade territory of Longmont are opposed, and hereby express themselves as opposed, to the enactment of any legislation that might place a rigid restriction on the importation of this Mexican labor into the United States; and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Colorado Congressmen and Senators in the city of Washington, D. C.

Resolution

Whereas the city of Sterling, Colo., is located in one of the best beet-raising sections in the country and the revenue derived from such beets is of material benefit to the well-being of the community; and

Whereas the farmers of this locality are now and have for years past been dependent on immigrant Mexican farm laborers for the labor work on the beets, which practice has proven, by experience, to result in the rendering of satisfactory service, and has not developed any great social, economical, or political problem and that there is no apparently visible source of supply of other farm laborers for this purpose; and

Whereas the prosperity of our section is dependent to a large extent on the continuance by the farmers of this system of employing beet laborers and that the welfare of the Mexican laborers themselves, and of their respective families, is promoted by the manner of employment indicated; and

Whereas many of these Mexican beet laborers employed in the agricultural territory adjacent to the city of Sterling, Colo., during the period of growing and harvesting local crops, return to their homeland at the end of the harvest season, they or their substitutes coming back to the United States each spring in search of farm employment, which necessitates the continuation of the opportunity afforded them at present, if a severe shortage of farm workers is to be avoided; and

Whereas it is rumored that there will be some agitation to restrict the further immigration of Mexicans for this purpose: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Lions Clubs of Sterling, Colo., in meeting assembled, That this club, composed of representative business and professional men of this city, is opposed to the enactment of any legislation or regulation seeking to impose further restrictions on farm-labor immigration from Mexico; and that a copy of this resolution be mailed to the Colorado Representatives and Senators in the United States Congress.

Resolution adopted by the Rocky Ford Chamber of Commerce December 2, 1927

Whereas an effort appears to be under way to introduce in the coming session of Congress an amendment to the immigration laws whereby further restriction on Mexican immigration would be adopted;

Whereas an average of about 10,000 Mexican laborers per annum have emigrated to the United States from Mexico and under the proposed amendment but about 1,500 per annum would be permitted each year;

Whereas this territory is dependent to a great extent on Mexican labor in its principal industries, viz, the beet industry and the melon industry, and such restriction would be a serious handicap to these industries: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Rocky Ford Chamber of Commerce, That we go on record as being opposed to such proposed restriction for the reasons above stated; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of the Senators and Representatives from Colorado as indicating to them the attitude of the citizens of the Arkansas Valley in Colorado.

BELLE DARING.

OVID, COLO., December 19, 1927.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PHIPPS:

Whereas the farmers of the Ovid locality are greatly dependent upon a class of immigrant labor which will adapt itself to the community; and

Whereas the Mexican laborer, whom they have employed for many years, appears to be highly satisfactory in that he presents no serious social, economic, or political problem and adapts himself to the community in which he lives; and

Whereas the crops grown in this locality necessitate such labor and the prosperity of the community would be greatly impaired should immigration of Mexicans be restricted; and

Whereas a great many of the Mexican laborers employed on farms adjacent to the town of Ovid during the crop season return to Mexico after harvest, and the next spring they or others come back to the United States, many of them coming back from year to year to our locality: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the chamber of commerce places itself on record as being opposed to any restriction in the immigration of such labor and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Colorado delegation in Congress.

THE OVID CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By R. H. SUTHERLAND, Secretary.

A resolution of the Mountain States Beet Growers' Marketing Association adopted November 23, 1927

There are strong indications that at the coming session of Congress an amendment will be introduced to the present immigration laws proposing further restrictions on Mexican immigration that would virtually prohibit the incoming of any farm laborers.

Although we solicit labor annually from distant States, each year we meet new difficulties in hiring a sufficient number of suitable farm workers. Under the proposed bill about 1,500 could be admitted each year from Mexico. During the last five years approximately 50,000 Mexicans have immigrated into the United States per year. This labor has been quickly absorbed, and yet the supply of farm labor has been short.

To our knowledge a large percentage of the Mexican farm laborers in Colorado return to Mexico each year on completion of the harvest. If their return to the United States was prevented, as now proposed, the farm-labor shortage would be greatly increased. In the sugar-beet raising districts this Mexican labor has done its work acceptably, and their presence has created no social problems of any moment.

For these reasons the Mountain States Beet Growers Marketing Association opposes any legislation placing additional restrictions on Mexican immigration. There is an association of agricultural interests which lately convened at El Paso, Tex., having for its purpose the protection in Congress of the farm-labor supply. Having been invited to join, we hereby pledge our support and cooperation. Among the interested groups of farmers are the orange growers of California, the cotton raisers of the South, citrus fruit and vegetable growers, potato farmers, and wool growers.

In taking this step the beet association is mindful of the rights and interests of others as well as its own requirements. We want to prevent a condition which would force one group of farmers to steal another group's farm labor. If the beet-field help is not available from Mexican sources, we would be forced to solicit labor from the corn and grain farming territory or from the cotton and vegetable producing districts. If, finally, sufficient workers are not obtainable for the sugar-beet growers, they would be forced to devote their lands to other crops of which there already is a plenty. The proposed legislation, if enacted, would force this struggle for labor upon an agriculture already bending under many problems.

The Mountain States Beet Growers Marketing Association also is mindful of the welfare of skilled labor, whose interests would be injured by the proposed legislation. The skilled mechanic is dependent upon the so-called unskilled farm labor for raw materials as well as food. The great brotherhoods of transportation workers are largely dependent upon farm tonnage. Without the products of the unskilled laborers the skilled workers would have nothing to do.

We also have in mind the public at large dependent upon agriculture. General business interests in our farming communities will suffer if this proposed legislation is enacted.

The Mountain States Beet Growers Marketing Association instructs its secretary to send a copy of this resolution to all members of the Colorado delegation in Congress as an expression of the association's position on this question.

Whereas it is proposed to enact national legislation further restricting immigration of Mexicans to the United States; and

Whereas the farmers of the Windsor district are now, and have been for several years past, dependent on immigrant Mexican farm laborers to complete their labor supply, and the practice of engaging Mexicans for that purpose has proven by experience to result in solving the labor problem without the development of any serious social, economic, or political problem; and

Whereas the prosperity of this locality depends in a large measure on the ability of our farmers to continue the well-established cropping plan of this section, and as there is not now any visible source of supply of farm laborers other than from Mexico, further restriction would be a calamity; and

Whereas it is evident that the welfare of the immigrant Mexican and his family is promoted by the character of the employment which he finds here; and

Whereas it is the custom of many of the Mexican farm laborers employed in the territory adjacent to Windsor during the growing and harvesting of crops to return to Mexico at the end of the harvest season with the intention of returning here the following spring in search of farm employment, or of sending substitutes to take their places, all of which in our opinion constitutes good reason for a continuation of the opportunity at present afforded them: Now, therefore, be it

COLORADO STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Denver, Colo., January 4, 1928.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: This morning the Rocky Mountain News carries an article relative to a protest by the Denver Chamber of Commerce to restriction on Mexican immigration.

The article states: "Chamber of commerce opposed to restriction of immigration from Mexico on ground that Mexican labor is essential to Colorado, especially in the sugar-beet industry."

The Colorado State Federation of Labor in several conventions assembled has vigorously protested the loose regulation on Mexican immigration from Mexico, in addition to the tremendous number who come into this country illegally.

Business interests generally favor Mexican immigration for the sole purpose of exploitation.

Organized labor protests the loose method of handling immigration from Mexico, because Mexican labor undermines the standard of American workers, and are establishing a lower order of civilization.

It is the firm conviction of organized labor of Colorado that rigid restriction should be placed on Mexican immigration, and the loose method of allowing their entry into this country illegally should be stopped.

Hoping you will give consideration to the wishes of organized labor of Colorado, I am,

Very truly yours,

JOHN E. GROSS,
Secretary-Treasurer.

THE RADIO SITUATION

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have here a letter which is addressed to me with regard to the radio situation. I presume it is likely that a similar letter has been sent to other Senators, but I desire to present this letter and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

380 CENTRAL AVENUE,
Newark, N. J., December 23, 1927.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
Senator from Idaho, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Do you realize how the Federal Radio Commission has throttled radio broadcasting?

Do you realize that the commission has practically deeded the air to the National Broadcasting group?

The situation merits inquiry and action on your part, particularly in view of the fact that the commissioners responsible therefor are about to come up before you for confirmation of their appointments, Commissioners Caldwell and Pickard.

Let us illustrate the situation of the small broadcaster by our case.

We operate a broadcasting station at Midland Park, Bergen County, N. J., call letters WTRL, which the commission has restricted to a very small station on a channel of 1,450 kilocycles, or 206.8 meters, and power of 15 watts. You can appreciate that this channel and power are so low as to make the station practically unusable.

Since last June we have been trying to obtain a usable channel from the Federal Radio Commission, and also an increase in power, but we have only been met with rebuff after rebuff and we have come to a strong realization that a small broadcaster might just as well butt his head against a concrete wall as to try to get anything from the Federal Radio Commission.

The situation created by the commission is extremely unfair and unjust and merits your attention, because the commission has and is discriminating against the small broadcasters of New Jersey and the rest of the country in their campaign to grant a complete monopoly of the air to the National Broadcasting group, which is dominated by the Radio Corporation of America.

For the purpose of helping out the commission and getting away from the New York congestion we applied to the commission to move the station to Long Branch, but on encountering opposition from the Asbury Park station we decided to move to Trenton and apply for channel 770 kilocycles, after consulting our engineers, one of whom, Paul E. Ware, is one of the leading radio engineers of the country. At first we took the matter up with Commissioner Caldwell, of New York, and after the usual "buck passing" on his part he finally told us to consult our engineers and select wave length, which we did, selecting said wave length of 770 kilocycles. When we submitted this wave length to him he hemmed and hawed and thought that it would cause interference with three stations in Chicago. We immediately consulted our engineers again, and obtained written reports to show that there would be no such interference.

When we showed these letters to Commissioner Caldwell and formally applied to the commission for this channel of 770 kilocycles, then for the first time and out of a clear sky, and apparently in furtherance of their elimination of the small broadcaster in New Jersey, Commissioner Caldwell informed us that New Jersey had greatly exceeded the power to which it was entitled to, and that it had approximately 48,000 watts. We immediately called his attention to the fact that he was doing New Jersey a grave injustice by charging us the power of the New York stations, which merely have their plants in New Jersey and their stations and studios in New York and who are regarded by the radio industry and the public, and also by the commission, as belonging to New York, which stations have approximately 40,000 watts out of the 48,000, and that this was discrimination and certainly did not show that the commission was acting equitably in the matter.

It is plainly manifest that the commission has absolutely decided irrespective of the legal and property rights of small broadcasters, and without giving any consideration to their taking of their property without the constitutional due process of law and compensation, to set aside the air for the National Broadcasting group.

The commission (in public announcements and according to a letter which our attorneys hold of Commissioner Caldwell, dated October 24, 1927) has formulated a policy to drive off the air all small broadcasters in channels from 300 meters (which is the beginning of the good channels) to 550 meters (which is the highest channel), there being approximately 40 wave lengths in these channels, 90 per cent of which have been exclusively granted to stations of the National Broadcasting group, and which have full time and power running as high as 50,000 watts. When you realize that the National Broadcasting group operates two chains which only require two channels for their broadcasting, instead of the 35 or 36 given to them, one realizes how unfair the commission has been to the small broadcasters and that a monopoly has been created in the name of the Government of this remarkable and important method of communication.

By a very clever and one-sided publicity bureau maintained in Washington, the public has only received the commission's viewpoint of broadcasting and the necessity for eliminating the hundreds of stations, so as to give the radio public a great variety of noninterfering programs, when, in fact, this variety has been reduced to two programs and is solely in the interest of establishing a monopoly of the air in favor of the said group.

Editorial opinion is awakening to the fact and is beginning to wonder why the commission desires to eliminate practically all the small broadcasters when the operation of several stations have shown that several stations may broadcast on the same channel and in the same vicinity without any interference whatsoever.

On December 6, 1927, an editorial appeared in the Newark Evening News which read in part as follows:

"The art of broadcasting is definitely limited for a long time to come to some 90 'communication channels.' The number of stations which may comfortably operate within these ninety-odd channels is variously estimated as lying between 150 and 450. The interesting thing at this time comes in the form of an announcement from Washington that the Federal Radio Commission may exterminate half of the existing stations.

"Certain facts with respect to present operation and the present state of the art are generally well known. Among these, two now stand out. First, broadcasting stations which regularly tie in with three major chains reach a total of about 65, and in so doing cover some 60 of the total ninety-odd available channels. Second, stations WBZ, at Springfield, and WBZA, at Boston, have been in simultaneous operation, utilizing the same channel, for close on to a year, with complete success and unexpectedly gratifying results.

"It is but natural that one ask why all stations tied in with a chain can not utilize the one channel. It is possible technically. It is actually now being done. The expense involved can not serve as an excuse. It is vanishingly small as compared to the magnitude of the immediate benefits which would derive to the chain broadcasters themselves, the public, and the art as a whole."

Just appreciate our position. Here we are, a small broadcaster in New Jersey; eminent engineers advise us that 770 kilocycles is an open channel; we apply for this channel, and the commission first advises us that they can not give us this channel because they have cleared this channel for one large national group, and that it may cause interference with three stations in Chicago, thousands of miles away. When our engineers, one of whom is one of the most eminent in the country, explodes this reason, then the commission tells us that New Jersey has too much power, and for this reason denies our application.

Is this fair to a citizen of the United States?

So as to substantiate our statements we have prepared and inclose a blue print showing the extreme favoritism and partiality which has been given to the large group, to the detriment and exclusion of the small broadcasters.

When our attorneys wrote a vigorous letter to Commissioner Caldwell calling his attention to this situation, he had the temerity to offer us a public hearing, and also to write us that reports had come to him that we were off the air, etc. We immediately advised the commissioner, so greatly interested in the public convenience, etc., that we did not propose to go through the futile performance of a public hearing, by which we could hope to gain nothing except to give the commission an opportunity to build up a case upon which to base the decision which they had already made against us, and also advising him that the reports which he had received were entirely erroneous, and were apparently inspired by the persistency of our application for use of channel 770 kilocycles.

Commissioners Caldwell and Pickard have been unduly harsh and severe and have practically crushed the small broadcaster. Commissioner recently made statement that commission was now "hard-boiled," and would proceed further and wipe out still more—300 of the 600 stations. What an outrage this will be if permitted.

You have many great national problems to consider, but radio-broadcasting is also a great national problem and one that holds forth such a great opportunity for enlightenment and improvement, and the commission should not be permitted to throttle the same and destroy the rights of small broadcasters.

The commission apparently does not give a "hoot" for anyone, Commissioner Caldwell stating that a great number of Senators had called upon him and the other members of the commission for the purpose of interceding for their constituents, but that they refused to do anything and that they proposed to rid the air of all so-called interference, Commissioner Caldwell stating that he was not responsible to anyone in the matter except to the President of the United States and that what he was doing had the approval of the President.

We feel that the attention of every Senator should be called to this situation and we are therefore sending a like letter to every United States Senator. This may result in the commission giving the small broadcasters the consideration to which they are entitled and also result in a fair and equitable solution of the radiobroadcasting problem in accordance with the spirit, as well as the letter, of the Federal radio act.

We beseech your interest and cooperation.

Respectfully yours,

TECHNICAL RADIO LABORATORY,
By D. W. MAY, General Manager.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution go to the calendar, as I desire to know something more about it than I know at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

LEASE OF BIEBER BUILDING BY DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1968) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement explaining the bill, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah that he may be allowed to explain the bill? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think I ought to explain the bill in detail to the Senate. The Bieber Building, located between Thirteenth and Fourteenth Streets on B Street SW., was leased from the owners of the building some 12½ years ago. The lease was for 10 years, with the privilege of its renewal for another term of 10 years, at $35,000 a year. The building was erected primarily for the Department of Agriculture. The entire first floor was constructed for the scientific work of the department, and every one of the eight or nine stories of the building was designed and built in accordance with the wishes of the Agricultural Department. The 10-year lease expired 2½ years ago.

The Department of Agriculture, at the instance of the Public Buildings Commission, requested an extension of the lease for another 10 years, according to the terms of the lease which the Agricultural Department held at that time granting that privilege. In the meantime, the building had changed hands; it had been purchased by Harry Wardman, Thomas P. Bones, and James D. Hobbs. When the request was made for an extension of the lease for 10 years it was refused on the ground that the Government of the United States had no privilege granted unto it by the lease. The Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture called upon me as chairman of the Public Buildings Commission and showed me the lease which the Government held, and in that lease there was a provision granting the privilege of a 10-year renewal. So the Public Buildings Commission instructed the solicitor to make the lease for another 10 years, but the owners of the building positively refused to do it.

The Department of Agriculture every month offered the monthly rent, and has done so for two years and a half, but the owners of the building refused to accept it. Finally they brought suit against the Government of the United States for possession of the building. The court decided that the contention of Harry Wardman, Thomas P. Bones, and James D. Hobbs was correct, for this reason:

Upon examining the records we find that the lease that was recorded had no provision whatever in it for an extension of 10 years. In other words, the lease that was recorded consisted of four pages exactly word for word the same as the lease that the Department of Agriculture held; but the lease that the Department of Agriculture held consisted of five pages, and one page of it gave to the Government of the United States the right to renew the lease for 10 more years. The court took the position that the lease that was recorded was notice to the Government, and therefore the Government had no claim whatever. The lease of the Government had not been initialed on every page. If it had, I am quite sure that this would not have occurred; but it was not done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, were these duplicate leases, or did the Government's lease merely purport to be a copy?

Mr. SMOOT. The Government's lease was a copy. The original was just as I have explained. The Solicitor of the Department of Agriculture has decided that it would be perfectly useless to make any further appeal. Therefore, as chairman of the Public Buildings Commission, I undertook to arrive at some understanding with the parties now owning the building for the future lease of the building.

They first insisted upon a rent of $75,000 a year for the building, based upon the value of the building to-day. I positively refused even to submit that figure to the commission; and for two or three months following that we tried to get together. Finally, I went to Mr. MADDEN, of the House of Representatives, and told Mr. MADDEN the condition—that we either had to get out of the building or else we had to make some kind of a settlement. I made a proposition of $55,000 a year instead of $75,000, and that we should have the privilege of renting the building for not to exceed 10 more years—or, in other words, from year to year—at that rate.

This bill provides for the leasing of the building for $55,000 a year and makes an appropriation for the back rents that have fallen due but which the owners have positively refused to receive. In other words, this back rent belongs to them, and the bill authorizes the leasing of the building at $55,000 a year for not to exceed a 10-year period, and settles all the back rent due. I may say that the back rent is at the rate of $55,000 a year, the same rate provided for the lease that is authorized.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that under the terms of the lease the Government has the option of canceling it at any time?

Mr. SMOOT. At the close of any one year; but it also has the option of taking the building for 10 years longer.

Mr. KENDRICK. Where is this property located?

Mr. SMOOT. Between Thirteenth and Fourteenth Streets on B Street SW. In other words, it is just adjoining the present Department of Agriculture, and was built expressly for the use of the department.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand from his statement that the bill appropriates in the nature of a claim for the back rent up to date?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all it does.

Mr. WARREN. It does not provide for the future?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. We owe the parties $119,323.12; and then we appropriate the further sum of $45,676.88 for the rent from the time the two and a half years expired up to this time.

Mr. WARREN. The proposal now is to pay them that money?

Mr. SMOOT. To pay them that money.

Mr. WARREN. But as to the future, in what shape is the matter left?

Mr. SMOOT. As to the future, of course, appropriations will have to be made annually for this purpose in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. So that Congress will determine each year what the amount shall be?

Mr. SMOOT. That will be included in the appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, has any investigation been made to ascertain why the fifth page was left out and not recorded with the rest of the lease?

Mr. SMOOT. Efforts were made to locate the parties, but it has been impossible to do so. I do not know how it happened. From now on, however, I think the solicitor of every department of the Government ought to have every page of every lease initialed. Then there will be no doubt at all about it; but that was not done in this case.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1968) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to pay to Harry Wardman, Thomas P. Bones, and James D. Hobbs, at the rate of $55,000 per annum for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., during the fiscal years 1926, 1927, and 1928, and the unexpended balances in the appropriations for rent for said department in the District of Columbia for the fiscal years 1926 and 1927, and the amount included in the appropriation for rent for said department for the fiscal year 1928 for said building, in all $119,323.12, shall be available pro tanto for said purpose, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the further sum of $45,676.88 to enable said Secretary to pay for the use and occupancy of said building for said fiscal years at the annual rate aforesaid, and if at any time hereafter during the occupancy of said building by said department the Secretary of Agriculture shall deem it for the best interests of the Government to lease said building for a term not exceeding 10 years he is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission, to do so.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS IN THE COAL FIELDS

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I submit a resolution which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. In offering the resolution I simply want to invite the attention of the Interstate Commerce Committee to a condition that beggars a description in the coal fields which are described in the resolution, and to ask of that committee that it give to the determination of whether or not an investigation ultimately shall be had, the best that there is in the committee, as of course it will do in any event, and that, if the conditions be as are reported, they uncover them fearlessly and let the people understand exactly what those conditions are.

The resolution (S. Res. 105) was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed immediately to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields of central Pennsylvania, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio; also to ascertain whether the railroad companies and their officials have been or are, by agreement or otherwise, endeavoring to depress the labor cost of coal produced by union-mine labor; also whether in the said coal fields wage contracts have been abrogated or repudiated, whether defenseless men, women, and children, without cause, have been evicted from their homes, and generally what has transpired in the said coal fields, and the reasons for conditions and happenings therein; and in this connection, the said committee shall ascertain whether in industrial disputes or strikes in said coal fields injunctions have been issued in violation of constitutional rights, and whether by injunction or otherwise, the rights granted by the Constitution of the United States have been abrogated and denied.

The expenses of said committee hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. Upon the conclusion of its investigation the committee shall forthwith report to the Senate.

Said committee is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time or times and at such place or places as it may deem necessary; and to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, and documents, and to do such other acts as may be necessary in the matter of said investigation.

The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who having been summoned as a witness willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation hereby authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MONEY ADVANCED BY NEVADA

Mr. PITTMAN. I introduce a resolution which I ask may lie over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 106), as follows:

Resolved, That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate the amount of money actually advanced and expended by the State of Nevada, or by the Territory of Nevada and assumed by said State, in aid of the Government of the United States during the War between the States, with such interest on the same as said State has actually paid, in accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court in New York v. The United States (160 U. S. 598); together with such amounts as have been heretofore reimbursed said State by the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

RADIO EQUIPMENT FOR THE SENATE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced a resolution providing for the electrical wiring of the Senate for the purpose of broadcasting the Senate debates. At that time I made the statement that no parliamentary body in the world had ever broadcast its proceedings. I made the statement on a limited investigation by the librarian in the Legislative Reference Bureau of the Library. On Friday last Mr. Meyer called me by telephone and said he had found that he was mistaken, and gave me a statement from which I want to give information for the RECORD.

This report by the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress shows that in the latter part of the year 1926 the Parliament of Finland, the Finnish Diet, broadcast the proceedings of the legislative body; that in Germany, in November, 1926, a large number of radio listeners petitioned for the broadcasting of the proceedings of the Reichstag, and after considerable discussion the proposal was amended and permission was given for the broadcasting of the speeches of the ministers and for the Government announcements.

The matter was taken up in the British House of Commons in March, 1926, and was discussed by Mr. Fraser on March 10, when he asked Mr. Baldwin, the parliamentary leader, as to the wisdom of the proposal. The matter again came up at a later period, March 22, when Mr. Baldwin said the "greatly preponderating body of opinion" was against broadcasting proceedings of the British House of Commons.

A report from Japan states that in December, 1925, the proceedings of the Japanese Parliament were broadcast. I have not been able to learn the results of this experiment.

I may add that the proposal to broadcast the Senate debates does not involve the expenditure of the millions of dollars that it is said to be necessary to expend in Senate Document No. 9, Seventieth Congress, because that report refers to a proposal that the debates should be broadcast through Government stations. I have here an editorial from the New York Herald-Tribune of January 6, 1928, on this subject, which I should like to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SENATOR "MIKE"

Senator DILL'S proposal that each desk in the Senate Chamber be equipped with a microphone finds us curiously responsive. Not that we consider the windy outpourings of the average Senator of sufficient importance to warrant their broadcasting from ocean to ocean, or that we think the public will find the day-to-day proceedings of that solemn body particularly instructive or entertaining. In seconding Senator DILL'S motion it is not the effect on the listeners we are thinking of, but the effect on the Senators themselves.

The radio is having much the same influence on oratory that the motion picture has had on acting; it is eliminating the ranter. We may say what we please about the interposition of the machine between performer and audience, but in both cases, in muting the spell of personality it has put a premium on matter as against manner. If you would be an actor for the screen, you must be above all things natural. Old-fashioned "acting" is out; the cold celluloid makes it ridiculous. Similarly, if you would talk to radio listeners you must do so quietly, naturally, with something to say. Coming out of the blank mouth of a loud speaker, old-fashioned oratory sounds exactly like the thing it really is—bombast.

So we are inclined to believe a "mike" on every Senator's desk would act upon him in the end not so much as an invitation to "tell the world" as a brake on his oratorical impulses. With nothing now but the helpless CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to talk at—if one omits the empty benches and a few sleeping colleagues—he can and does cut loose with hurricanes of "hot air." But with a cold metal "mike" staring him in the face and the consciousness that behind it lurked a vast audience only a little more responsive, would he curb his fustian and "get down to cases"?

EXECUTIVE ASSUMPTION OF WAR-MAKING POWER

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by Albert H. Putney, professor of constitutional law in the National University Law School, on the subject "Executive assumption of war-making power." It consists of 41 pages, with citations and notes, published in the National University Law Review of May, 1927, volume 7, part 2.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator realizes that printing an article of this kind in the RECORD costs about $100 a page. Would not the Senator's desire be met by having it printed as a public document? In that case it would be printed in larger type, and at less expense.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the article is a very valuable compilation of authorities upon the question. My purpose is to make it available to Members of this body, and to the public generally. It has been suggested that perhaps it would be more desirable to have it in the form of a public document. I therefore change my request in that regard and ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be printed as a public document.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I am informed by proper authorities that the law in this District prohibits the driving of an automobile by any child under 16 years of age under any conditions or circumstances; and from 16 to 18 a child may drive by the consent of its parents, provided one of the parents is in the car at the time; that trucks may be driven by boys from 18 to 21 years of age, but no vehicle that carries passengers may be.

I ask that the clerk read an article from this morning's Washington Post, and I ask the Committee on the Judiciary to give consideration to the bills which I introduced at the last session of Congress, and also at this session, asking that the laws of this country be enforced to all people alike.

I think that when a country sends a man to this country as an ambassador, or in any other capacity, it certainly should not send a murderer, or a rapist, or a man who would commit arson; at least it should send one who would not be guilty of any one of those three classes of crimes. When they have no regard for this country, but send that class of people here, I think that when they kill children on the street, when they take Amercian girls to places for debauchery and debauch them and brag on it, and openly violate the Constitution otherwise, it is time to lay aside courtesy, and instead of having troops in Nicaragua, where we have no business, to defend money interests, we should bring them here and put them on the streets of the District of Columbia to protect the lives and the property and the virtue of the women of our country and the lives of our little boys and girls.

I ask that the committee give consideration to my bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the article.

The Chief Clerk read as follows from the current issue of the Washington Post:

IMMUNITY PLEA MADE FOR BOY

A plea of diplomatic immunity was entered yesterday in behalf of his 14-year-old son, Henry A. Howard, driver of an automobile which figured in a traffic accident Saturday night, by Sir Esme Howard, the British ambassador.

Police of the fourteenth precinct honored the claim and as a result any action taken against the boy will have to come through the Department of State. Young Howard was driving an automobile, occupied by his mother and father, which struck and severely injured Beatrice Mae De Forest, 12 years old, daughter of John S. De Forest, paymaster of the United States Weather Bureau, of 3028 Porter Street NW., at Connecticut Avenue and Porter Street NW., where she alighted from a street car.

The child was taken to Emergency Hospital, and after treatment her condition was considered not serious. She was permitted to be removed to her home. At the home, her parents stated, the child had suffered concussion of the brain and a loss of memory and her condition had taken a serious turn since her discharge from the hospital.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 52) submitted by Mr. MCMASTER December 13, 1927, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Senate favors an immediate lowering of tariff schedules, and tariff legislation, embodying lowered schedules, should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MCMASTER. Mr. President, at the outset I wish to say that there are three principles pertaining to the tariff system which has been advocated by the Republican Party and which may be expressed in the following language:

1. The tariff shall represent the difference in the cost of production at home and the cost of production abroad.

2. If the agricultural class, or any other class, because of conditions imposed by a tariff system, can not obtain a just and proportionate share of national prosperity, then additional compensatory legislation shall be enacted to give to such class its full and proportionate share of national prosperity.

3. Using the language of the statesman, John Sherman, "If the combination [meaning a trust or a monopoly] is aided by our tariff laws, they should promptly be changed, and, if necessary, equal competition with all the world should be invited in the monopolized article."

The essence of those principles has been enunciated time and time again in Republican platforms. The most illustrious leaders of the Republican Party, men who have been pillars of strength to the party, have championed those principles; and now, if the discussion of these questions reveals that the policies of the Republican Party do not conform to those principles, then speedy action should be taken in order that our policies should be in alignment; and that will add to the strength of the Republican Party. If, on the other hand, these discussions show that the Republican policies are in alignment on those principles, that will add to the strength of the Republican Party. However, that which is of infinitely more importance will be this, that the public may be benefited by the discussions.

Before entering into a discussion of the pending resolution, it would be well to examine and to inspect a certain nostrum that is being used for the purpose of soothing and allaying this rising tide of discontent among the farmers over these tariff relationships. That nostrum is this: We are informed by those in high places with great assurance that everything the farmer uses in farming is upon the free list, and most of the things that he sells are upon the protected list. In order that we may have a clear and comprehensive idea of those articles upon which the farmer pays a duty, and which are known as the necessities of life, but which he does not use in farming, permit me to read just a partial list:

Kitchen and household utensils, stoves, furniture, sheets, pillowcases, mattresses, rugs, carpets, table linen, tableware, clocks, glassware, earthenware, clothing, hosiery, gloves, all wearing apparel, and hundreds of other articles.

It is equally certain that the following articles, which the farmer uses in farming, are also upon a highly protected list:

Scythes, sickles, hammers, saws, scoops, shovels, pitchforks, corn knives, grass hooks, grindstones, pliers, files, drainage tools, machine tools, horseshoes, horseshoe nails, nails, steel wire, galvanized wire, roofing felt, strap leather, paints, brick, tile, baling wire, cast-iron pipe, cream separators valued at $50.

Then we are informed that harnesses are upon the free list. The buckles and the clasps and the hardware used in connection with harnesses are upon a highly protected list, and who ever heard of a farmer using a harness that did not have a buckle or a clasp or some hardware on it? As a matter of fact, the importations of harness into this country are insignificant. All of which goes to show that this provision for free harnesses is a sham and a fraud.

There are those who point with great pride to the fact that farm implements are upon the free list. Let us examine the subtle sophistry of that contention. The prices of farm implements are controlled and dominated by a trust that not only controls and dominates the farm-machine market of America, but which controls and dominates the farm-machine market of the world. The importations of farm machinery into this country are insignificant. Last year we exported $78,000,000 worth of machinery, and the farm implement is one of the few manufactured products of this country that has been steadily rising in price since the war. A binder costs more money to-day than it did at war-peak prices, because the heads of the manufacturing concerns which manufacture farm implements meet in secret and behind closed doors, and make up the price list for the ensuing year. Does anybody doubt that statement? Let the record speak. The report of the Federal Trade Commission on the causes of high prices of farm machinery says:

> Practically all important manufacturers of farm implements are members of the National Implement and Vehicle Association, which was formed in 1911 by the union of several existing farm-implement associations.
> Under cover of bringing about uniform cost accounting, uniform terms of sale, and standardization of products the manufacturers who are members of these associations repeatedly advanced prices of farm implements by concerted action during the period 1916 to 1918, inclusive.

What they were doing during that period they were doing before that time and continued to do after that time.

Thus disappears the sophistry of those who would lead the farmer to believe that because his farm implements are upon the free list he has been given a special favor under this law.

We have examined the list of articles upon which the farmer pays duty and we find that he not only pays a duty upon the necessities of life which are not used in farming, but we find that he pays a duty upon practically all the articles used in farming excepting farm implements, and when the farmer buys farm implements he is gouged by a giant Machine Trust.

Now, for a moment let us examine some of the schedules of the tariff act of 1922.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MCMASTER. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the Senator leaves the discussion in relation to imported farm machinery I want to call his attention to the fact that the value of agricultural implements manufactured in the United States in 1921 amounted to $334,915,000, while the importations of farm implements—that is, those farm implements which are free of duty—amounted to the insignificant sum of only $2,327,956.

Mr. MCMASTER. But some of those imports might have been reimports of machinery which had been exported by us.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to say to the Senator that any 10 important agricultural counties in any one of the Mississippi Valley agricultural States would absorb all imported farm implements, which would not have an appreciable effect upon the price of farm implements.

Mr. MCMASTER. I think the Senator is quite correct in his conclusion. The figures which he furnishes conclusively show that so far as farm machinery being upon the free list affecting the price in America, it has no effect whatsoever.

Let us proceed to examine some of the schedules in the tariff act of 1922.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MCMASTER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In the manufacture of farm machinery a great deal of iron and steel is used.

Mr. MCMASTER. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I did not hear all of what the Senator said. Did the Senator call attention to the fact that the tariff on pig iron was raised 50 per cent a year ago?

Mr. MCMASTER. I did not call attention to it, but that is a statement of fact that the Senator from Minnesota has made.

The law was supposed to establish a copartnership wherein industry and agriculture were to share and share alike. The amazing discrepancies and disparities between the protection afforded agricultural products and the protection afforded industrial products are astounding.

The duty on cattle, 1½ to 2 cents per pound, is approximately 16 per cent of the present market value. The duty on sheep is $2 per head, or about 25 per cent of the present market value. The duty on corn is 15 cents a bushel, or 16 per cent of its market value. The duty on wheat is a tariff of 42 cents a bushel, which is largely inoperative. The duty on horses and mules is 20 per cent of their value. The duty on eggs is 8 cents a dozen, or 25 per cent of their value. The duty on poultry is 3 cents a pound, approximately 10 per cent of its value. The duty on milk is 2½ cents a gallon, or about 5 per cent of its value. The duty on wool is 12 cents per pound, or 30 per cent of its value.

There are innumerable articles of finished steel and iron products with duties ranging from 25 to 45 per cent. The duty on rugs and carpets is from 40 to 55 per cent of their value; on finished cotton and woolen goods from 25 to 55 per cent of their value; on chemicals, oils, paints, and coal-tar products, 25 to 40 per cent; on clothing made of wool, 24 cents a pound and 40 per cent of its value; on white granite, semiporcelain, earthenware, and stoneware, 45 per cent of their value; table and kitchen articles and utensils of glass, 50 to 55 per cent of their value; table, kitchen, bread, and butcher's knives, from 1 to 16 cents each, and in addition thereto 45 per cent of their value. The duty on table and household utensils made of aluminum is 11 cents a pound and 55 per cent of their value. This deadly parallel could be continued indefinitely.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MCMASTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been wondering from what tariff act the Senator is quoting.

Mr. MCMASTER. The tariff act of 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is quite wrong in some of his figures.

Mr. MCMASTER. The Senator will have an opportunity to check all of those errors.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not have an opportunity to look them over.

Mr. MCMASTER. The Senator will have an opportunity in the RECORD to-morrow to correct any error. I took them from the tariff schedules under the act of 1922. At any rate, they are not so far off but that after the Senator has corrected them he will discover an amazing difference between the outrageous schedules afforded industries and the pitiable amounts of duty that were afforded agricultural products. No one need to go much further than the parallel of duties allowed to agriculture and duties permitted on industrial products to ascertain why the farmer's dollar is worth only 89 cents.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MCMASTER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator, before he concludes his very able address, will quote the statement of that illustrious Republican, former Senator Knute Nelson, with reference to the same tariff act which the Senator is discussing, in which he said the manufacturers knew what they wanted, and came here with their bag and baggage and got all that they wanted. He could not have said that of the farmer.

Mr. MCMASTER. These figures are taken from schedules which were written in the tariff act of 1922.

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me, the rates in the emergency tariff act and in the 1922 tariff act were as high as the farmers requested at the time the bill was written. Representatives of the agricultural industry of the country appeared before the committee and the rates they asked for were given them.

Mr. MCMASTER. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that I am just coming to the testimony given by the representatives of the farm organizations before the Committee on Finance and that will completely answer the contention made by the distinguished Senator.

We find the Finance Committee of the Senate meeting in the summer of 1921. Those were dark, tragic days for agriculture. In 1920, when they ordered deflation, the Federal Reserve Board committed the most monumental blunder ever committed by a governmental agency during the last quarter of a century. Every impartial student to-day recognizes that act as a vicious act, recognizes that that act was conceived in folly, and it was executed in folly.

On the one hand we have a governmental agency which was commanding the farmers to pay, and on the other hand we have another governmental agency destroying the guaranteed price of wheat, taking away from the farmer his ability to pay, with the result that within a few weeks wheat dropped from $2.26 a bushel to 50 cents a bushel, corn dropped from $1.75 a bushel to 20 cents a bushel, and other products correspondingly were decreased in value, with the result that the farmers' values were deflated by $20,000,000,000. No greater economic tragedy was ever visited upon a class during the war save only in those lands which were torn by shot and shell and swept by the flame of war.

It was in the shadow of that tragedy that we find the Finance Committee of the Senate meeting in the summer of 1921.

We find representatives of farm organizations from all over America appearing before that committee and asking for help, asking for protection in their hour of need. We find the representatives of the dairying interests of New England, from the Mid West, from the Pacific Coast States, appearing before that committee asking for a duty of 3½ cents a gallon on milk. In those dark days a fair price for milk for the farmer would have been a wonderful boon to him. The dairying interests produce 14,000,000,000 pounds of milk in America annually. Did they receive that 3½ cents per gallon on milk? Oh, no. They received 2½ cents a gallon.

Mr. SMOOT. It was 3 cents before.

Mr. McMASTER. That furnishes the justification, then, for always permitting just enough importation of milk to keep the farmer's nose on the grindstone.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator again that the farmers of the country dictated every tariff figure in the bill.

Mr. McMASTER. It looks like it.

Mr. SMOOT. Every one of them. I say that to the Senator now without a moment's hesitation.

Mr. McMASTER. Let us proceed to examine the evidence and if the Senator wishes to quarrel with the record, that will be his privilege.

We find the representatives of the dairying interests appearing before the Finance Committee asking for a duty of 10 cents a pound on butter. While one of the witnesses was testifying we find the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] interposing with a question.

Senator SMOOT. I am wondering why you are asking more than 8 cents here, when your exports are over 50 per cent of what your imports are.

Mr. BALDERSON. For the simple reason that we object—

Again he was interrupted by the Senator from Utah interposing:

To any coming in?

Mr. BALDERSON. To being a dumping ground for butter from other countries who want to flood this country, at times when it suits them, with surpluses which they can not sell in their regular markets.

Did they receive their duty of 10 cents a pound on butter? No; they received 8 cents a pound, but after a lapse of four years, after this matter had become agitated, fearing an exposé of the outrageous schedules that were given industrial products, there was an increase of 4 cents a pound in the duty on butter, raising it to 12 cents a pound.

Now, we find appearing again before that committee the representatives of the Livestock Association of America. Mr. E. B. Speller, of Fort Worth, Tex., representing Texas and Southwest Cattle Raisers' Association, appeared before the committee. He made this remarkable statement, the facts of which are well known to producers of cattle throughout America:

As to what benefit the tariff on cattle and hides would be to the livestock producers, I see it in this way: We know that in Argentine, Brazil, New Zealand, and other countries, they produce livestock, cattle, and sheep in very large quantities. Stock producers of those countries are the big packers of this country. They can throw on our markets at any time they desire enough beef to demoralize our beef market and they can throw upon our market at any time enough mutton to demoralize our mutton market. That is not speculation; that is not what we believe, but it is what we have seen done time and again in the past. We ask for those people who are struggling to try to remain in business, to rehabilitate their business, that they will be given the benefit of the tariff that will take away the danger of having their market destroyed in that way.

Then Mr. Prior, representative of the American Livestock Association, took the stand. In his testimony as to the needs of the cattle industry, he was interrupted by Senator SMOOT—

Senator SMOOT. Mr. Prior, will you tell me briefly just what you want so that I can have it here to refer to quickly?

Mr. PRIOR. That you enact a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on all cattle and 20 per cent duty on hides imported into this country.

Did the livestock producers of this country receive an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent upon cattle and a 20 per cent duty upon hides? Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. But they would have received it if the Republican Party had been able to control the situation. The duty on hides was defeated here on the floor of the Senate. I have voted for every duty on hides which has been proposed since I have had an opportunity to vote on tariff bills.

Mr. McMASTER. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that he has voted for that duty.

Mr. SMOOT. That duty was in the bill when it was reported.

Mr. McMASTER. I am merely trying to call attention to the fact that the farmers did not get in the bill as high duties as they were asking for.

Mr. SMOOT. And I want to say——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] turns his back to us on this side of the Chamber. I do not know whether he does so because he does not wish us to hear what he is saying or not, but we wish to hear what is going on.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated the fact that the duty upon hides was defeated here upon the floor of the Senate, as, I suppose, the Senator from Mississippi will remember, but the Senator from South Dakota is charging that action to the Republican Party.

Mr. McMASTER. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that if the Senator will ascertain who voted for a duty on hides he will find that every one of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are going to support his resolution voted against it, with the exception of the Senator from New Mexico, and, I think, one other western Senator on the Democratic side, who voted for that duty.

Mr. McMASTER. It is immaterial to me who was responsible for the situation. All I want to show is that the farmers did not get what they asked for and they are going to ask for more and they expect to get the protection for which they will ask; they expect to get much—lot more than they have ever asked for in the past.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as concerns the duties which the farmers wanted, I will say that the farmers got everything they asked for in the present tariff law. There may have been some who said, "We want a larger increase," but if the Senator from South Dakota will ask the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] I think he will have confirmation that my statement is accurate.

Mr. McMASTER. The junior Senator from Idaho, as the RECORD shows, stood on the floor here pleading for a duty on hides. The RECORD also shows that the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] had to use the utmost endeavor to get an 8-cent duty on eggs when the farmers were asking for a 10-cent duty on eggs. What I am trying to show is that all the farmer asked for is not contained in the present law, and I think I am establishing a pretty fair case.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator may think so, but whenever one takes the tariff act of 1922 and compares it with the Democratic tariff act, it will be seen that nearly every item that the Senator has referred to to-day is on the free list in the Democratic tariff act. I have that list before me and it shows that the farmer had no protection at all.

Mr. McMASTER. That did not afford any excuse or justification for us when we had an opportunity to put on agricultural products duties as high as we possibly could get for them.

Mr. SMOOT. The junior Senator from Idaho, who spoke for the farm bloc at the time of the passage of the bill, stated that it was the only measure by which the farmers of this country had been amply protected.

Mr. McMASTER. But the farmer did not get everything in the law for which he was pleading. He failed, for instance, to secure a duty on hides.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor did I get everything in the law for which I was pleading.

Mr. McMASTER. It was disclosed that certain tanners appeared before the committee and objected to free hides; but possibly hides were put upon the free list because shoes were put upon the free list; though certainly the price of hides has very little relation to the price of shoes. Mr. E. W. Rucker, the attorney for the National Livestock Association, filed with the Committee on Finance a statement showing that a 15 per cent ad valorem duty on hides would not increase the price of shoes more than from 3½ to 4½ cents.

Mr. McLEAN. That is true; and the tariff on pig iron has very little relation to the price of harvesting machinery.

Mr. McMASTER. That may be true.

Now, in regard to the duty on rice, the two Senators from Louisiana had to put up a very strong fight on the floor here to obtain a duty on rice, showing that all along agriculture had the contest of its life and had to make the fight of its life to get what it did in the present tariff law.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt the Senator from South Dakota and if he does not care to be interrupted I will consider his wishes in the matter.

Mr. McMASTER. I want to be interrupted.

Mr. McLEAN. I am very much interested in his discussion and I am exceedingly interested in the prosperity of agriculture throughout the country. I think I advocated the highest duties which were requested on agricultural products, especially on milk and butter. It seems to me that the remarks of the Senator so far indicate that, in his opinion, the rates on agricultural products are not sufficiently high.

Mr. McMASTER. I am making the contention that the rates upon industrial products are so outrageously high that they ought to be pared down, which would increase the purchasing power of the farmer and would not injure the industries in the slightest degree. It would also be of distinct benefit and advantage to the country.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator know whether the rates on industrial products are higher than they should be?

Mr. McMASTER. I am just coming to that.

Mr. McLEAN. Because up to this time, apparently, what the Senator wants is another emergency tariff law to raise the rates on agricultural products.

Mr. McMASTER. We want a square deal.

Now, in regard to the duties that were allowed on industrial products, how different was the attitude of the Committee on Finance in regard to the rates to be imposed. The evidence shows that there were certain manufacturing concerns appearing before the committee at the very hour when they were asking for increased tariff rates which were fairly dripping with profits and cash dividends and stock dividends and surplus accounts. The record shows that shortly after the new protective tariff duties became firmly established, so far as industrial corporations were concerned, within a few months they began to declare enormous stock dividends. As an illustration of what was going on at that time, exemplifying the prosperous condition of those companies, I have a list here of certain corporations, which is as follows:

The Parke Davis Co. increased its capital from $12,000,000 to $25,000,000, and declared a stock dividend of 100 per cent; the New England Spring Bed Co. increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000, and declared a stock dividend of 400 per cent; the Victor Talking Machine Co. increased its capital from $5,000,000 to $35,000,000, and declared a stock dividend of 700 per cent; the Whitin Machine Works increased its capital from $600,000 to $9,000,000, and declared a stock dividend of 1,400 per cent; the Brown-Sharp Co., of Providence, R. I., increased its capital from $100,000 to $16,000,000, and declared a stock dividend of 16,000 per cent.

I should like to know how many farmers in the year 1922 declared a dividend of as much as 16 cents, let along 16,000 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator claim that the tariff had anything to do with the institutions which he has named?

Mr. McMASTER. The Senator from South Dakota claims that at the very hour when these exorbitant schedules were being enacted into law these and other industrial corporations were immensely prosperous; that they were just on the eve of declaring these huge stock dividends, and there was no evidence of their financial condition which warranted the schedules and rates which were given to them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that the tariff duties had nothing to do with the profits of the Victor Talking Machine Co.; and he must also know that tariff rates had nothing to do with some of the other companies to which he has referred. The prosperity of those companies is largely determined by patents which they hold, and the tariff has nothing to do with such patents. If their products are protected by patents and the American people buy the patented goods with no duties whatever they would be prosperous. Then why does the Senator bring such illustrations in here in condemnation of the tariff?

Mr. McMASTER. Does the Senator say that the Brown-Sharp Manufacturing Co., of Providence, R. I., which declared a stock dividend of 16,000 per cent, received no benefit from the tariff law?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know whether they had ever increased their capital prior to that time? Does he know that they grew for over 75 years and then decided they would issue the stock to their stockholders instead of proceeding as they had done in the past? Yet the Senator charges that to the tariff.

Mr. McMASTER. If the Senator from Utah desires to explain their prosperous condition or to make excuses for them, that is his privilege. I was merely showing——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think that the profits of that company were made in one year?

Mr. McMASTER. Let us take up the aluminum schedule.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with the aluminum schedule, let me say to the Senator that aluminum ware can be bought to-day, notwithstanding the tariff duties on it, almost as cheaply as tin can be bought. Evidently something has occurred to reduce the price.

Mr. WALSH of Montana and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. McMASTER. I yield first to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The matter of duty on aluminum has been under consideration by the Senate on several occasions since the enactment of the law. The remarks just made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] prompt me to say a word. I am talking not about aluminum ware but I am talking about sheet aluminum, ingot aluminum, of which the Aluminum Co. of America has a complete monopoly and on which there is a duty of 3 cents a pound. Immediately after that rate of duty was established the Aluminum Co. of America increased its price from 21 cents to 25 cents, and to-day the current price is 27 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me say to the Senator from Montana that if he will consider the prices of other products not only of mills but of various manufacturing concerns in the United States, whether they be dutiable or whether they be free, he will find that the increase in the price of aluminum is not nearly as much as is the increase in the price of many other commodities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am giving the facts as they stand.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may give the facts as he understands them, but he does not explain that wages in this country have increased 100 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Have they increased 100 per cent since 1922?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know as to the particular industry——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Have wages increased 100 per cent since 1922?

Mr. SMOOT. They have increased very greatly, but I will not say that they have increased 100 per cent since 1922.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, we do not know what the figures are as to the Aluminum Co. of America, because they never make any report at all of any kind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McMASTER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to ask that the Senator from South Dakota may be permitted to have the floor and deliver his address. Interruptions by Senators which may tend to break up the continuity of thought in his speech ought not to be permitted; he ought to be able to deliver his speech, and deliver it fully and clearly without continuous interruptions that will make his speech in the RECORD appear to be no speech at all but a general discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. For the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that the Senator from South Dakota asked for interruptions, and said he would be pleased to have them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; but I do not think he asked to have speeches injected into his speech.

Mr. McMASTER. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted for questions, but I would prefer not have speeches made during the interruptions.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator I will not interrupt him any further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McMASTER. Speaking of the aluminum schedule, when I remembered the pitiful amount of duties that were afforded the agricultural schedules, and realized the deplorable condition that agriculture was in at that time, I said to myself that if aluminum finished products had a duty of 11 cents a pound and an ad valorem duty of 55 cents per pound the evidence must reveal a frightful condition of the financial affairs of the aluminum industry of America. So I went through the testimony given before the Committee on Finance, but in that testimony I found very little evidence as to the actual financial condition of the aluminum company. I then went back to the hearings held before the House Committee on Ways and Means in 1912, and there we find the representative of the Aluminum Co. of America testifying to the fact that back in 1890 that company was organized with a paid-in capital of $1,500,000, and then we find that in 1912 that company had accumulated a surplus of $28,000,000, and that their capital and surplus had increased to $30,000,000. Then picking up the thread of the story, I found a letter published in the RECORD during the Senate debates in 1922 showing that that $30,000,000 of capital in 1912 had increased to $131,000,000 in 1922, in addition to the cash dividends which had been paid; and in addition to that the stock value of that company upon the markets at that time amounted to $300,000,000, or it would have sold for that upon the stock exchange.

We have, therefore, a little capital of $1,500,000 during the course of a few years expanding and growing until it has reached $131,000,000.

I want to say to you that when some good farmer's wife out in the Northwest learns that upon an aluminum kitchen utensil of a factory value of $2 she must pay an ad valorem duty of 55 per cent, or $1.10, and 11 cents a pound in addition thereto, making $1.21 upon that aluminum kitchen utensil, and then when that farmer's wife thinks of how she must labor and with patience go out and gather 5 dozen eggs at a market value of 25 cents and transport those 5 dozen eggs to a market 5 or 6 miles away as a tribute to the aluminum industry of America, and when she thinks of the hundreds of dozens of eggs that she has thus contributed to the aluminum industry, and then when she recalls that when her husband goes with a bushel of wheat to the market he must transport that bushel of wheat to the world market and receive what the world will give for the wheat, I want to say that that woman is going to become agitated. But when that woman realizes and is informed that the officials of this aluminum company have opposed and do oppose every effort that is made to give that farmer's wife and her husband an equal share in the national prosperity, that woman is going to act; and you need not be surprised if she with her vote places a stick of dynamite under those aluminum schedules and all other similar schedules, blowing into smithereens that portion of your tariff system which permits of excess profits, which creates a breeding ground for trusts, and harbors and shelters monopoly.

The great Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Jardine, says that if a woman should do a thing like that she would be an unthinking person. He says only the unthinking would criticize this law or would attempt to change any schedules in it.

That good woman out there in the Northwest may not comprehend the intellectual processes of the great Secretary of Agriculture, but she does comprehend and understand the common sense and the militant Americanism of John Sherman, who said that if there is any article that is monopolized the tariff laws should be lowered, and, if necessary, that monopolized article should be opened to the free competition of the world. John Sherman may not be as great a man as the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture; he may be unthinking; but still there are many who have great respect for the ability of John Sherman.

This tariff compact between the agricultural West and the industrial East has been in existence for a long period of time, and out of this long experience we find the farmer emerging with an 89-cent dollar. During the last 16 years that dollar has reached par only three times. During the last seven years it has ranged all the way from 69 to 89 cents in value; and one of the greatest factors producing that 89-cent dollar is the present tariff system under which we operate.

I want to say to the representatives of this industrial group you can no longer continue preaching to the farmers the doctrine that legislation will not help agriculture to obtain its just and proportionate share of national prosperity. The same chicanery and hypocrisy was practiced upon the laboring classes in England a century ago. The condition of English labor was pitiful. It beggars description; and English labor at that time went before Parliament and asked for a 12-hour day. Then these philosophers, these economists representing the industries of England, went before Parliament, and they said, "That proposal is economically unsound." They said, "You can not legislate the number of hours that a man can work, because you are legislating the price of labor, and when you legislate the price of labor you are increasing the cost of production, and if you do that you will ruin and destroy English industry, and take away from labor all opportunity for employment."

The 12-hour-day law was passed. Then came the 10-hour-day law, then the 8-hour-day law, and still English industries continued to expand and grow and develop; all of which demonstrates the fact that when human justice and human rights and a larger opportunity for the farmer and the laborer become enthroned in law they have a way all their own of making ridiculous the sophistries of avarice and of greed.

I wish to state here that the farmers of America are going to start to slash and hew their way through the barbed-wire entanglements that bar their pathway; and when they do that they know that their feet are treading upon a pathway of sound economic doctrine.

Last year the wages received by the American laboring man amounted to $11,000,000,000. Suppose you could cut that in two, and transfer five and one-half billions over to the profit account of the corporations. Would that spell prosperity for industry? Most assuredly not. With that decreased purchasing power factories and mills would close, and industrial valuations would be decreased by billions of dollars. If you add $2,000,000,000 to the purchasing power of American agriculture, you not only restore the billions that they lost through deflation but you stimulate every factory and mill in the United States to its capacity; you add billions of dollars of increased valuation to industrial values in the United States.

This resolution was not introduced merely for the purpose of a tariff revision, but it has a deeper significance than that. Only a few years ago the agricultural population was 60 per cent of our total population. It has since dwindled to 50, then to 40, and now it is only 29 per cent of our total population. As that population dwindles, so does its political power wane and fade; and the hour has come now for the farmer to strike, or else it will be too late.

I want to say to the representatives of the industrial group that the farmers of America are going to wage this fight to a finish; and if the industrial group invites it to its final conclusion it may smash your tariff system, but out of the ruins will arise a new tariff system and other compensatory legislation, which will give economic justice not only to the farmer but to the industrial classes as well.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER] a question, if he will permit me. Would the Senator be willing to have his resolution changed by striking out the word "lowering" and insert the word "revision"; in other words, permit the resolution to favor revision of the tariff schedules rather than lowering of the tariff schedules?

Mr. McMASTER. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that I do not care to quibble over the words in the resolution so long as there is a distinct understanding and the words express the fact that there shall be a general lowering of tariff schedules. A revision, of course, might mean upward, and it might mean downward.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think a general lowering is what is usually expected to happen when there is a revision. However, the opposite has sometimes happened.

I think the resolution as written would place some Senators in the position of advocating lower rates for protected industries that would be injurious. Nearly every Senator here, who has been familiar with tariff revision laws, will agree that in many instances there have been great abuses, extreme abuses; the protective-tariff principle has been used to enrich a few, it has been used for political advantage, and has tended to develop favored classes and cause the concentration of wealth in small groups in this country. It has been used to extort millions and millions of dollars from the great consuming public. Yet I recognize the fact that there are industries in this country, legitimately conducted, that are entitled to reasonable tariff protection, judicially determined, with a sincere consideration of the rights of the consumer as well as of the manufacturer or the producer.

The trouble with our tariff policy has been that instead of fixing tariff rates based on careful research and ascertained facts we have too often thought only of satisfying those who came here asking for tariff protection for their own selfish ends. Our attitude has been like a court of justice giving the plaintiff without hearing the defendant the amount of damages which he asks. In my judgment, the tariff policy pursued by the majority party has been one of simply asking the question, "How much do you want? Are you a good Republican? Did you contribute to the campaign fund? Are you loyal to the cause of the dominant party?" It has been a matter of criticism and, indeed, of condemnation for Senators to ask that the books of these tariff-protected industries be presented so that we may investigate what wages they are paying, how much the wage earners are getting of this tariff protection, to find out what their profits are, and to what extent the public is being charged unnecessarily increasing prices. I, therefore, agree with much the Senator has said of existing abuses in his able speech. It is a very excellent contribution to the public information on this important national issue. However, I, for one, refuse to be put in the position of denying reasonable tariff protection to any legitimate industry or honest producer in this country competing against cheap labor abroad who come here and show that the very life of a particular American industry depends upon reasonable tariff protection.

Therefore I hope the Senator will consider the suggestion I have made, and when we take this matter up to-morrow we can so change the resolution as to show our opposition and determination to provide against legalized extortion under the guise of protection, by passing a resolution that will give assurance to the American public that these highly protected and privileged groups can no longer enjoy this excessive protection; that every legitimate industry and producer having a good case will know that the Senators in this body, whether they come from the North, South, East, or West, are willing to hear them. But we want facts. We want to know the exact degree of protection they need, and we will give them only that degree of protection which is fair to the producer, the wage earner, and the consuming public.

Mr. President, the agriculturists of the West are not the only group injured by the alleged increased prices resulting from excessive tariff rates. Excessive and unreasonably high tariff rates tend to promote general profiteering upon all classes of our population, to encourage industrial gambling and speculation, to destroy private enterprise, and ultimately lead to creation of monopolists. For instance, the exorbitant duties which have been levied upon raw wool has had a tendency to destroy the woolen manufacture industry instead of helping it.

The manufacturers and producers who benefit by protective tariff duties that are defensible are those engaged in producing commodities that either do not entirely supply the home market and must, therefore, compete with comparable imported commodities, or if they do supply the entire domestic market are actually, not fancifully, threatened with competition through importations from abroad in such volume as to be a factor in reducing domestic prices. In such instances our industries may claim protection against cheap foreign labor by tariff duties that equalize the difference in the cost of production here and abroad; such tariff duties serve the purpose of permitting the manufacturer to obtain a price equal to the price of production abroad plus duties collected at our customhouses upon the foreign-made competitive article. That degree of protection I am willing to extend to every honestly organized industry and producer. I do not intend to threaten such legitimate industries with a threat of a sweeping tariff reduction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to join with the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] in requesting a modification of the resolution, inserting the word "revision." I, myself, am very much in favor of increasing some of these tariff duties, especially with reference to farm products. I am gratified, therefore, with the opportunity to join with a Senator from one of the New England States, that region of the country from whence comes the doctrine of reciprocity with Canada, in urging revision rather than horizontal lowering.

I hope the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER] will see his way clear to modify the resolution, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, so that while we are considering the question we may consider increasing the duties upon farm products, and give the home market exclusively to the American farmer for those products which he is able to produce.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question, and I want to put it in relation to a concrete matter, in which the people of my State are very much interested.

Under the present tariff law shingles were put on the free list. That has practically destroyed the shingle industry in our State. I ask the Senator whether in any revision carried on in line with the language of his resolution a tariff could be put on shingles.

Mr. MCMASTER. I will say to the Senator from Washington the spirit of the resolution, the intent of the resolution, is that if there is a manufactured article that needs protection it will receive protection. If the Senator had been here when I started my remarks, he would have heard me define that principle and declare that that was the principle for which the Republican Party stood. That is the intent and purpose of the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that I was here when he began, and I heard the statement he made, but his resolution reads as follows:

> That the United States Senate favors an immediate lowering of tariff schedules, and tariff legislation, embodying lowered schedules.

Mr. MCMASTER. It does not say "all" tariff schedules. If I had intended that all tariff schedules should be lowered, I would have used the word "all."

Mr. JONES. It says "tariff legislation, embodying lowered schedules"

Mr. MCMASTER. I wish to ask the Senator from Washington if the resolution were changed in the way he suggests, would he vote for it?

Mr. JONES. I do not know whether I would or not. I do not know just what revision the Senator is proposing to have made. I assure the Senator that his resolution will have my careful consideration, and I shall vote as I think I ought to vote.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I hope the suggestions made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and by my colleague [Mr. JONES] about the changing of the wording of this resolution will be agreed to by the Senator from South Dakota. There are in the present tariff law certain schedules that are so manifestly unjust and unfair that to declare merely for a lowering of the schedules would by no means meet the situation.

I do not believe in absolute free trade. Nor am I one of those who believe that simply because some industry wants tariff protection it would be granted such protection. I believe that if the Tariff Commission does its work as it was intended it should do it, and Congress would follow its recommendations, we would then evolve a tariff which would equal the difference between the cost of production at home and the cost of production abroad. That should be our policy.

As was suggested by my colleague, we formerly had a great shingle industry in the State of Washington, and when a tariff was put on logs and shingles left on the free list, immediately a premium was placed upon oriental labor in Canada. Previous to the enactment of the last tariff law there was no tariff on either logs or shingles. Since the adoption of the discriminatory tariff on logs and the failure to place a tariff on shingles, 131 shingle mills in the State of Washington have been forced out of business, and approximately one-half of the shingle business has been destroyed, due to the discriminatory tariff against our own business. In addition to that, Canada has an export duty on logs. So that the present tariff law not only interferes with the free intercourse of the lumber industry in the Northwest, but it places a special discrimination against the shingle industry by putting a tariff upon logs.

This is but one of a number of examples in the present law which I think could be cited and which I feel justify us in insisting that we shall have a revision of the tariff rather than a mere lowering of the schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I do not intend to take any time in a lengthy discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to remind the Senator that the Finance Committee reported a duty on shingles, and the Senate saw fit to take that duty off.

Mr. DILL. I am not criticizing the Finance Committee. I am talking about what the tariff law provides and what it has done to this great industry of the Northwest.

If the situation had been allowed to continue as it was, the industry might have survived, but when a tariff was put on logs and a tariff was refused on shingles the shingle people were driven out of business, and unless the law is changed most of the rest of the shingle mills in my State will be compelled to close.

All they are asking for is fair treatment in this matter, and the only reason we can not get it for them is that the party in power, the party pledged to tariff protection, by its tariff law, is destroying the shingle industry in the Northwest. Now, the Republican leaders tell us they will not take up the tariff question. The people of the Northwest have elected men to the Senate and the House on the theory of tariff protection. But we can not get tariff protection because the administration will not permit the opening of the tariff schedules in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt my friend?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator, I know, will be fair enough to state or, if you please, to admit that the Finance Committee put a tariff on shingles and then, when the bill came up in the Senate, the Senate took it off. I do not remember the vote exactly, but I think that nearly everybody on the other side of the Chamber voted to take it off, and most of us on this side voted to keep it on.

Mr. DILL. I must say to the Senator that I was not here or I should not have so voted. But I do say this: That with the tariff law existing as it does, discriminating as it does in a way to destroy the shingle business, the party in power is responsible for refusing to permit the question to be opened and the injustice which has been proven by experience to be corrected.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does it not strike the Senator with amazement that the party in power has fallen down on certain schedules and yet was able to muster votes enough to put into that law some of the most outrageous schedules that any tariff law ever carried?

Mr. DILL. I may say to the Senator that I am not discussing what the Finance Committee brought in here; it is what the law is to-day. I am talking about the effects of that law.

Mr. CARAWAY. My friend from Indiana intimated that the Republican majority failed, and that the minority took the bill away and wrote out the schedules.

Mr. WATSON. That very often happens in the consideration of a tariff measure.

Mr. DILL. I think the Republicans were in control of the Senate and House, and the Republican Party must take the responsibility for what the House and the Senate did in this matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wish my friend from Utah, who is prepared now to show that certain schedules were forced into Republican legislation by the Democrats; that there were schedules the Republicans are responsible for, and some that somebody took away from them and wrote into the bill, despite his earnest protest, would please tell us why it was that he, as a conferee and the chairman of the conferees, failed to stand up for this industry out in Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not in conference.

Mr. CARAWAY. It was in the bill as it passed the House, and you struck it out in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do not dodge that. Of course, it was in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. The House yielded.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the Senate yielded.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I am very glad I was not here and did not have any responsibility for the passage of a law that, under the guise of protection, has practically destroyed a great industry by discriminatory tariff rates on logs and no tariff on shingles.

Not only does what I say apply to the tariff on logs, but it applies also to the tariff on manganese. A tariff on manganese to protect the manganese industry of this country was attempted to be written into the tariff measure in the Senate, but when it came out of conference we found that the tariff was such that the manganese industry of the far West could not compete with the manganese mines of Austria, east of Chicago, where the great steel industry has its great amount of business. The tariff provided is just about equal to the freight rate east to Chicago. Consequently the manganese mines of the West are practically closed most of the time, because the great steel corporation, with all its protection on steel, with all its protection otherwise, has such a low rate on manganese that it can use its mines in Austria without interference by the tariff, and so prevent development of the manganese mines in the far West. I do not want to vote for a resolution that provides only for lowering the schedule. If we are going to maintain the high tariff rates on manufactured articles, then I want some protection for others similarly affected. When I read that the steel corporation is lowering wages and lengthening hours in the last few years, with all its high protection, I wonder what justice there is for the continuation of these rates, especially when they insist upon practically free trade for the manganese which is used in the making of steel.

Mr. President, I do not know what the effect of other similar discriminations may be. I am not here to attack or abuse anybody because of the provisions written into the law. I shall assume they were honestly written. But when actual practice has proven that they are destructive to the great business interests in the part of the country from which I come I can not remain silent and hear the law defended as a perfect law. On the other hand, neither will I vote for a resolution which simply proposes to lower rates, because, unless certain rates are equalized, other rates must be raised in order to give protection to the very industries which are affected by tariff legislation.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Seventy-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand it, the McMaster resolution is now the unfinished business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is pending before the Senate because there is no unfinished business before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. HARRISON. By virtue of its coming over, it remains before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless displaced by motion or otherwise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is not strange to me that our Democratic friends want the resolution modified, because I have analyzed the votes on the Democratic side taken when the present law was under consideration before the Senate, and it is rather strange to find that nearly every Democratic Senator voted for particular increases higher than the present law carries. It all depends upon where the product is produced or raised. I am not a spotted protectionist. I believe in protection whether it be for the farmer, the manufacturer, or for any industry that may be established in the United States giving employment to American labor and paying American wages.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I may not have understood the Senator correctly, but I think I gathered from his remarks that he said that pratically all Democratic Senators voted for rates higher than are included in the present law.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say all the Democratic Senators. I said each Democratic Senator——

Mr. HARRISON. Well, then, a Democratic Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; covering most of the Democrats in the Chamber. I will go that far.

Mr. HARRISON. They did vote for rates higher than are in the present tariff law?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; on particular items.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator ought to specify them and put their names in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I had better do so, although it will take some time to read them all.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has plenty of time.

Mr. SMOOT. The first one is the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. That Senator voted to increase the duty on citrate of lime, to increase the duty on amorphous graphite, for the Poindexter amendment to increase the duty on crude magnesite, for the Poindexter amendment to increase the duty on dead burned magnesite, for the Poindexter amendment to increase the duty on caustic calcined magnesite, to increase the duty on cattle, on fresh beef and veal, on honey, on unshelled almonds, on shelled almonds, on unshelled walnuts, on shelled walnuts, on soya beans. He voted for the Gooding amendment, which would in effect retain the duty on vegetable oil for nonedible use, and so forth.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I have not finished with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator made the statement that Democrats had voted for rates higher than are in the present law, and in practically all the instances cited he has shown where the Senator from Arizona voted to increase over the old tariff duty.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; not at all; over the present law.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not carry out the idea the Senator suggested at all.

Mr. SMOOT. It is in accordance with the bill reported to the Senate. I will not go all through the others in detail. I will not read the next page. I will simply say that Mr. BROUSSARD voted against reducing the duty on acetic anhydrides and against reducing the duty on boric acid. That was an amendment offered by the then Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Jones.

Mr. CARAWAY voted for the Nicholson amendment to the committee amendment to increase the duty on amorphous graphite. Mr. CARAWAY voted against striking out of paragraph 302 the words "manganese ore or concentrates containing in excess of 30 per cent of metallic manganese, 1 cent per pound." He also voted against the committee amendment reducing the duty on paddy or rough rice.

Mr. Culberson voted against the Ashurst amendment to place tomatoes on the free list, and he voted also against the Newberry amendment to remove the 10 per cent ad valorem duty from amorphous graphite.

Mr. Dial voted against the amendment to place tomatoes on the free list during certain months.

Mr. FLETCHER voted for a duty of 5 per cent ad valorem on chemical wood pulp. He voted for the committee amendment placing a duty on hides and cattle and voted for an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole increasing the rate on citrus fruits.

If Senators do not desire that I shall take the time to read the entire list I shall not do so but will ask later on to print it entire in the RECORD. I may say, however, that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] voted for the Gooding amendment to the committee amendment, which would in fact retain the duty on vegetable oils for nonedible use and voted for the committee amendment to place a duty of 7 cents a pound on long-staple cotton. He voted also against the committee amendment reducing the duty on peanuts not shelled.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. To what bill were those amendments offered?

Mr. SMOOT. They were offered to the tariff bill of 1922—the present tariff law.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let us suppose that the Senators whose votes the Senator from Utah is quoting were in favor of lowering the tariff duties; is there any inconsistency in their voting for a particular higher schedule when a high schedule all along the line is forced upon them?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite catch the purport of the Senator's question.

Mr. BROOKHART. A majority against those Senators was forcing higher schedules all along the line. I do not see any inconsistency in their voting for a particular high schedule, although they might be in favor of generally lower schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. The pending resolution favors "an immediate lowering of tariff schedules."

Mr. BROOKHART. Generally.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what it would be construed to mean—as favoring a lowering of the tariff rates.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield to me, I desire to say that I do not know that I quite comprehend his last observation. Does the Senator mean to state that the last tariff bill, as reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate, provided for a lowering of the rates imposed by the then-existing tariff law?

Mr. SMOOT. No. That suggestion has not been made at all, but before I get through I will refer to some of the increases which were reported by the committee.

Mr. KING. But the Senator does not mean to state that the bill as reported to the House or to the Senate or as it was finally passed provided for a lowering of tariff rates in comparison with the rates in the law which then existed?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, no; I have never claimed that. I am only saying now that most of the Senators upon the Democratic side voted for higher rates on certain items in the 1922 tariff bill than the rates which had been reported by the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that might be the case with respect to some items as indicated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], but the Senator from Utah knows that when the conference report was finally voted upon in the Senate an overwhelming majority of Senators upon this side voted against the bill; and Senators upon the other side—men like Senator Cummins and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—also voted against it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is a fact; I am not a Senator who will offer an amendment on the floor of the Senate and vote for it and then vote against it when the question comes on the passage of the bill. I have never as yet done that. I am either opposed to protection or I am for it; and I presume the Senator knows that I am for protection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he means by that that the taking of a small dose of medicine being entirely proper should a man be offered a barrel of poison he would be bound to take it because he agreed to take a little dose of medicine? Some of the schedules were proper; Senators might properly vote for a tariff upon, for instance, wool, or upon some other commodity, and yet when the bill came loaded as that bill was with thousands and tens of thousands of increases in the schedules it became so monstrously unfair that Senators who voted for a particular item on that bill might vote against the entire bill. The Senator's position, as I understand him, is that if a Senator voted for some righteous measure he then committed himself to vote for the bill with its unrighteous characteristics though they were mountain high.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going that far. I am only stating what I would do. There was no use of taking the small dose of poison. If I supported the increases on the floor of the Senate and praised a bill, then I would not think myself justified in voting against it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator will not help in framing a bill the way he wants it when he intends to vote against it?

Mr. SMOOT. I never stated any such thing as that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did the Senator vote for the so-called Versailles treaty in which was incorporated the covenant of the League of Nations?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not.

Mr. PITTMAN. Did the Senator vote on the reservations offered to that treaty?

Mr. SMOOT. I voted for two of the reservations.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator then voted to attach reservations to the ratification of the treaty and then violated his principle by voting against the treaty after the reservations were adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. But the Senator from Utah did not act in any instance merely because of the fact that the item applied to the State of Utah, or some other particular State, he wanted to be perfectly free to say that he voted for those items in which the State of Utah, or any other State, for that matter, was interested. I can take the RECORD and show that Senators on the Democratic side in numerous instances voted for a higher rate of duty on certain products than had been reported by the committee because those commodities were produced in their States.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator is entirely right. Some of us Democrats were interested more in our States than we were in some of the eastern trusts, and I think if he will analyze it he will find that is what happened.

Mr. SMOOT. Some of the commodities to which I call attention, perhaps, may be produced by what are called trusts, but the charge as to trusts does not scare me. It may appeal to some unthinking people, but when they know the facts it will have no force with them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I recall that when the Fordney-McCumber bill was under consideration before the Senate the Senator from Utah took the position that conditions were abnormal, and that it was necessary to enact at that time duties which experience would probably disclose to be excessive. In order to afford an opportunity for relief against those probably excessive rates he advocated what has become known as the "flexible" provision of the tariff law, giving to the President of the United States the power to raise or lower tariff duties 50 per cent after complaint and after investigation by the Tariff Commission. I recall that the Senator from Utah declared that the object of that provision was to guarantee a reduction of the tariff in cases where the rates proved to be excessive. He said:

> Seldom will it be necessary to employ this extraordinary and unusual provision, giving the Executive the authority to perform a function which the Constitution reposes in the Congress—

And so he said:

> Let us pass this flexible provision in the tariff bill so as to make sure that the President will lower the tariff rates when conditions justify it.

The Senator from Utah recognized the fact that the Fordney-McCumber tariff law in many of its important provisions probably carried rates too high——

Mr. SMOOT. Or too low.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that those rates would necessarily be lowered in the future. Now, the "flexible" provision of the tariff has operated quite differently from what the Senator from Utah expected. It has turned out that the power given the President under that provision has been employed almost solely to increase the burden of taxation upon the American people, to raise tariff rates, and has seldom been employed to reduce such rates.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been employed to increase the rates on agricultural products, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Utah is now making an argument which if submitted to the Senate by anyone else would be denounced by the Senator from Utah as sophistry. He is contending that when a measure admittedly one for high tariff protection is presented to the Senate a Senator who does not believe in high tariff protection is estopped from voting to increase any rate carried in the general bill.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I do not think the Senator can say that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the logic of the Senator's position.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will yield to me, I wish to say——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course the Senator may resume the floor whenever he wants to. I thank the Senator from Utah for yielding to me.

Mr. SMOOT. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas at any time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like first to answer the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wish to call attention to an error made by the Senator from Arkansas. I wish to point out that the President, under the "flexible" provision of the tariff law, reduced the tariff rates on quail, on broomstraw, and on catgut.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On live bob white, quail, imported from Mexico the tariff was reduced, and on certain classes of brushes the tariff was likewise reduced.

Mr. SWANSON. And, as the Senator from Mississippi says, on catgut.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I started out not to answer the Senator from South Dakota particularly. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] in his statement made me think of the votes which had been cast during the consideration of the last tariff bill in 1922. In regard to the statement of the Senator from Washington respecting shingles, there was no question about the Finance Committee reporting to the Senate just the duty that was provided on shingles in the House; the Senate Finance Committee reported the bill to the Senate containing that duty; but the Senate turned down the committee; the Senate did not want any duty on shingles. It is charged that the Senator from Utah yielded in conference, but the Senator from Utah did not yield at all; the House yielded, and shingles went on the free list.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah does not dispute the statement I made, to the effect that the present tariff law is destroying the shingle industry of the Northwest.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to see a tariff on shingles, I will say to the Senator; but there is another factor in the situation which is tending to destroy the shingle industry to which the Senator has not called attention. I did not intend to refer it, but inasmuch as the Senator is questioning me I will say that the wooden-shingle industry is being affected, particularly in the East to-day, by metal shingles, and by composition shingles, which are being produced and which are being used, and which take the place of, perhaps, millions of wooden shingles which were formerly used.

Mr. DILL. The Senator knows, if he has studied this question at all, that there are more shingles being imported from Canada into the United States than are being made in the United States. Shingles are not made in Utah or the Senator would have seen that protection was afforded to them at the time; I recognize that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington wanted a protective duty on shingles, and the Senator from Utah voted for it, but he was voted down by the Senate.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator again that the tariff on logs, which forbids a mill from bringing them in, and free shingles, are destroying the shingle business of the Northwest.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. DILL. And the Senator from Utah is opposed to opening the question for revision so that those industries may be given a chance to live.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly am opposed to opening it at this time. We could not open the tariff question here for shingles alone.

Mr. DILL. Not only for shingles, but there are a number of questions. Why not revise the tariff? Conditions have changed. Is it because only the great industries that are getting such big protection oppose it?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER] thinks the tariff ought to be revised for the farmer, and I think perhaps there are some things that the farmer uses on which the tariff should be revised.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I understood the Senator from Utah, in answer to the Senator from Washington, to say that metal shingles are one of the things that affect the price of shingles.

Mr. SMOOT. Composition shingles are now taking the place of wooden shingles and are largely used in their stead.

Mr. HARRISON. The ad valorem duty on metals carried in the present law is 49 per cent, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think it is. I do not think there is any.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not saying shingles; I say metal. If it is a metal shingle, it is a kind of metal. What is the tariff duty that is carried on metal shingles?

Mr. SMOOT. There is none.

Mr. HARRISON. There is no tariff on metals?

Mr. SMOOT. On metals? That is an entirely different proposition. If the Senator will say what kind of metal he refers to, I can tell him.

Mr. HARRISON. Metal shingles. Does the Senator assert that metal shingles come in free?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not know, then?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that at all.

Mr. President, before proceeding with the remarks I intend to make upon this resolution I think it would be better, rather than to take the time of the Senate, to put in the RECORD a statement showing the votes against and for the items in the tariff bill of 1923.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question in order that I may understand his position. Is it the Senator's position that because one does not favor a high tariff he estops himself from voting for any tariff on a particular commodity that is imported?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator did not hear what I said in the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I heard it, but I did not understand it.

Mr. SMOOT. The resolution calls for a lowering of the tariff; and I called attention to the votes of the Democratic Senators who wanted increases over and above the duties then provided.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator feel that if an article in a given bill is on the free list, a Senator commits himself to a policy of high tariff protection if he votes for the imposition of a reasonable or a limited duty on that particular commodity?

Mr. SMOOT. The items that I referred to and the items referred to in the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota did not affect the free list at all. I am talking now about the resolution introduced by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know the Senator has gotten away from the subject of the votes of Senators for the imposition of duties on certain commodities. What I am asking the Senator is whether he takes the position that a Senator who does not favor the general rates carried in the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill is committed to the policy of voting against increasing any of those rates or decreasing any of them?

Mr. SMOOT. No; every Senator can do so as his judgment dictates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Did not the Senator state to the Senate when the Fordney-McCumber tariff law was under consideration that many of the rates in the bill were imposed with regard to postwar conditions, and that they probably would prove to be too high?

Mr. SMOOT. Too high or too low.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And did not the Senator say that probably the principal use to be made of the flexible provision of the tariff law was to lower rates that would prove excessive?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember whether I said that or not; I have not looked it up, but I do remember saying that the provision was adopted by the Finance Committee, and the Senate was asked to approve it, because of the fact that conditions in the world were unsettled.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will state that my recollection is—and I think the Senator should refresh his own recollection on that subject—that the principal justification which the Senator from Utah offered for the provision in the Fordney-McCumber tariff law giving to the Executive a duty which is essentially legislative—namely, the duty and privilege of raising or lowering the rates under certain conditions—was that the rates would probably prove too high and would have to be lowered in the early future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know what I had in mind, and I do not remember using the words referred to, other than to increase or decrease. In other words, a general revision of the tariff would be necessary so often that to do justice to the industries of the country, with that power granted to the President, within the limitations named in the provision, many injustices—for there never was a tariff bill passed that did not contain some injustices—could be rectified by the action of the President upon a hearing before the Tariff Commission instead of waiting until a general revision of the tariff law was made.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what does the Senator think will be the proper time to revise the tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. To be perfectly frank with the Senator, I do not think it ought to be done in a presidential year.

Mr. DILL. In other words, we will have to wait two more years before it can be considered?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Let us hope we will have a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress by that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Then God save the country if you do, if you pass another Underwood bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, He probably will.

Mr. SWANSON. He usually has saved it, in spite of the Republican tariff, when an emergency arose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the resolution offered on December 13 by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER] reads as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Senate favors an immediate lowering of tariff schedules, and tariff legislation embodying lowered schedules should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress.

Mr. President, this resolution, if adopted, will declare to the world that the United States Senate is in favor of lowering the import duties provided in the tariff act of 1922. It will do more than that: It will announce that the Senate's indorsement of the policy of adequate protection in 1922 was a mistake—a positive injury especially to the agriculturists of the country. For this reason I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. MCMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator explain just how the lowering of tariff duties on industrial products, for example, will injure agriculture?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait I will cover that whole subject in its regular order, I can assure the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will, because we have been waiting about five years to hear that. I hope in the next 30 minutes the Senator will answer what we have been waiting five years for.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is a mighty good thing he has been waiting.

I do not wish to go on record as admitting that my action and vote in 1922 was against the welfare of the farmers, and that I was wholly mistaken in my efforts to aid agriculture, and that my colleagues who supported the measure are responsible for the depression in agriculture, as alleged by the promoters and supporters of this resolution.

The demand for a restoration of adequate protection when the Republicans were returned to control of the Federal Government came from the representatives of agriculture even more than from the representatives of industry. It came from the farmers of the Middle West and Northwest even more than from the manufacturers of the East. It came from Iowa, Nebraska, the two Dakotas, Minnesota, and Kansas quite as vociferously as from New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Even Texas, Louisiana, Georgia, and Virginia agriculturists joined in the demand for protection of their main products.

Examination of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate and the debates and votes in both Houses of Congress discloses the fact that the protection of American farmers and American farm products was uppermost in the minds of the Members of Congress and the Executive. President Harding's first message to Congress recommended a restoration of protection to American farm products so ruthlessly destroyed by the Democratic low or competitive tariff of 1913.

The Republican administration keenly recognized, and recognizes now, the existence of a critical and serious farm problem brought about by the World War and the Democratic low tariff of 1913. It denies that the cure or remedy lies in a lowering of the tariff schedules, either on agricultural products or on manufactures.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator just as soon let me go on with what I have here? Then I will answer any questions he desires to ask; I shall be glad to do it; but I think more than likely I shall cover what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. MCMASTER. Is not the Senator willing to answer questions?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to answer any questions that the Senator from South Dakota desires to submit just as soon as I get through with the remarks I have prepared.

The first Republican emergency tariff bill of 1920, devoted almost exclusively to the protection and welfare of the farmers and cattle growers, was vetoed by President Wilson March 3, 1921. It restored protection to wheat, wheat flour, corn, beans, peanuts, potatoes, onions, rice, sugar, lemons, cattle, sheep, fresh mutton or lamb, long-staple cotton, and wool.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield? I just want to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to get this matter in the RECORD in some sort of order, if the Senators please. Then I will yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. SWANSON. May I ask the Senator a question? I am asking for education.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will get it by the time I get through.

Mr. SWANSON. No; I do not expect to. I understood the Senator to say that President Wilson vetoed the bill to which he referred.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly he vetoed it.

Mr. SWANSON. He knew it was a lemon and the farmers knew it was a lemon you were trying to give them.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; they came right back and asked for the reenactment of it, and it was done and received the hearty approval of all farm organizations.

Mr. SWANSON. President Wilson knew it was a lemon, and he vetoed it; and all the farmers out West knew it was a lemon, and rejected it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken; that is all.

Reenacted by a Republican Congress, the second emergency tariff of 1921 was signed by President Harding. It was hailed with delight by the agriculturists as a wise and beneficial measure. It checked the importations of many competitive agricultural and dairy products, and, according to the Tariff Commission (sixth annual report), "doubtless exerted a stabilizing influence by raising the cost of competitive agricultural imports." It prevented a further decline in the prices of domestic products. The commission said: "The downward swing of prices was checked in the fall and winter of 1921."

THE 1922 TARIFF

The tariff of 1922, known as the Fordney-McCumber Act, was the second step taken by a Republican Congress in response to the widespread demand for a restoration of adequate protection. Again a Republican Congress and administration placed agriculture first, and responded without stint to the arguments of the farmers and farmer organizations in favor of adequate protection to farm products and cattle. Every commodity raised or produced on the American farms was protected by an import duty with hardly a single exception.

Mr. MCMASTER. I did not quite understand that statement. Was it that every article raised on the farm was protected by a duty? Was that the statement made?

Mr. SMOOT. With hardly an exception.

Mr. MCMASTER. "With hardly a single exception." For example, take the matter of hides.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee reported a duty on hides and the Democrats voted against it. That is one of the exceptions.

Mr. MCMASTER. If they are on the free list, I would not, if I were the Senator, convey the impression that everything is on the protected list.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that. I said that hides are one of the exceptions. The Senator knows why.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, this morning I checked up and found some $500,000,000 of imports on the free list in 1926.

Mr. FESS. Not produced in this country?

Mr. BROOKHART. Several hundred of them were produced in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. You could take some of the products, such as sugar, that runs into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and find that we do not produce sufficient of it in this country; but it is an agricultural product. The amount that is produced in this country is protected. That forms the great bulk of the figure to which the Senator from Iowa just called attention.

In most instances the degree of protection was dictated by the so-called farm bloc in both Houses of Congress. The result was a tariff law pronounced by the leaders of the farm bloc the first tariff act ever placed on the statute books giving the farmers and growers all the protection they asked for.

Mr. McMASTER. Oh, now——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator was not here at the time, but I know that is what they told me, and it was stated on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. Those were Wall Street farmers.

Mr. SMOOT. Then ask the junior Senator from Idaho if he is a Wall Street Senator or not.

Mr. McMASTER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to proceed with this, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. McMASTER. Is it not true that out of the Finance Committee itself, of which the Senator was one of the dominating figures, schedules were sent here that were below what the farmers' representatives had asked for?

Mr. SMOOT. I think there were one or two cases like that.

Mr. McMASTER. A small item, for example, like milk, where the farmers produce 14,000,000,000 pounds a year in this country; another small item, for instance, like butter, of which hundreds of millions of dollars worth are produced every year; and hides, of which millions of dollars worth are produced; just a few items like that came out of the Finance Committee with rates below what the farmers had asked for.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just about the limit to which the Senator can go. In addition to that, look at what was provided in the Democratic law.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let us take wheat again. There was a rate of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and more than half of that was nullified by high railroad rates.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am talking about the tariff now. A comparison of the agricultural, wool, and flax sections of the Democratic tariff of 1913 and the Republican tariff of 1922 shows to what extent the Republicans went to give the agriculturists the protection they wanted and needed.

It is interesting to examine the votes of some Senators, especially from the South, on specific items or articles, illustrating how eager those Senators were to condemn protection in the abstract but indorse it in the concrete. Democratic Senators voted against an import duty on wool, wheat, and corn, yet voted to increase import duties on cattle, fresh beef, lamb, bacon, lard, vegetable oils, long-staple cotton, rice, soy beans, peanuts, and graphite. Every Senator from the States of the Middle West and Northwest, save one, either voted for the 1922 tariff or was paired in favor of it. The two Senators from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK and Mr. Sterling] voted for it.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

The economic conditions of not only the United States but the whole world in 1921 and 1922, resulting from the World War, presented many new problems affecting international trade and exchange, both having an important bearing on the tariff. It was difficult to determine what constituted adequate protection and what would be fair rates of duties. The war had interrupted normal exchange, forced currency inflation, raised nominal prices and values. The whole economic world was out of joint, and the framers and builders of the 1922 tariff were confronted with a serious and complicated problem. The so-called flexible tariff was incorporated in the law to meet contingencies that might arise out of the disjointed economic conditions of the world. It was an experiment; and its constitutionality has been favorably tested before the lower courts, and is now before the United States Supreme Court. The principle of protection runs all through the entire law and benefits agriculture just as much as it benefits manufactures, so far as any tariff law can operate.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator make a note of his questions and ask them later? I would like to get my remarks completed now, because I think they are worthy of consideration.

Mr. McMASTER. I think they are, and I thought mine were, too, but I was constantly interrupted by questions from the distinguished Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. As soon as the Senator objected I did not interrupt him again.

WHAT A TARIFF CAN DO

No tariff act can accomplish the impossible or suspend the operations of economic law. No act of Congress can arbitrarily and successfully defy the laws of the universe, create something out of nothing, alter human nature, or create wealth. The power of the Federal Government is limited. The jurisdiction of Congress or the Executive does not, can not, compass the broad field of human intelligence, initiative, energy, wisdom, and personality. Some seem to think that an act of Congress can work miracles in any field of human activity. An act of Congress, in the economic world, can only create tendencies and help or hinder in the struggle of life or of nations. The tariff of 1922 was designed to help agriculture in its fight for control of the domestic markets—to compel all foreign agricultural producers and growers to pay toll for the privileges of selling in the American markets. Has it accomplished all that was expected in this direction?

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, may I ask just a question here, just one? This will be the last question.

The question I desire to ask is this: There is in this tariff law a provision known as the drawback provision.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McMASTER. That is to say, when an American manufacturer imports raw materials from a foreign country, if he manufactures those materials into a finished product and exports them, the duty is refunded to him.

Mr. SMOOT. Ninety-nine per cent of it.

Mr. McMASTER. That is most all of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McMASTER. Which means that when the American manufacturer desires to compete in foreign markets with cheap European labor, he can evade buying his goods from the American farmer, and can buy the raw materials in foreign countries; but when the farmer produces a surplus crop, he can not evade buying his goods from the American manufacturer, can not step across the Atlantic and buy cheap goods, which are wholly to be used in the production of a surplus crop that is to be used in competition with foreign labor and foreign markets. I want to ask the Senator if that privilege is accorded to the manufacturers of this Nation, why should it not be accorded to agriculture—that is, in a measure—in a fair proportion?

Mr. SMOOT. That provision of the law applies to every individual or corporation in the United States.

Mr. McMASTER. Will the Senator please point out how the farmer can receive the slightest benefit from that provision of the law?

Mr. SMOOT. Who receives the slightest benefit other than labor from the manufacturer making goods that do not enter the American market? It simply gives employment to American labor.

Mr. McMASTER. The farmers are going to hear more about this provision in the law. You have accorded to the manufacturers a privilege, giving them the right to evade purchasing goods of the American farmer when they desire to compete in foreign markets, but when the American farmer raises his surplus crop to compete in foreign markets, you oblige him to buy every article he uses in the production of the crop in the American market.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the Senator name one thing, while he is at it, one single item, that could be treated in the same way by the farmer.

Mr. McMASTER. That could be treated?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McMASTER. One article that could be treated in the same way?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McMASTER. You give a certain special privilege to the manufacturer and you will not give the same privilege to the American farmer.

Mr. SMOOT. The farmer has the same privilege as I have stated. What privilege does he want, and for what? What item do you want to cover?

Mr. McMASTER. It is the principle underlying the whole proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. If we can give more employment by exporting finished goods from products not made in this country but imported for reconditioning or finishing, if you please, and selling them to a foreign country, it certainly gives employment to American labor, and they buy and use the farmer's products.

Mr. McMASTER. If the American farmer could get a rebate of some of the duties on some of the articles that he uses in the production of his surplus crop there would be great benefits accruing to him and to his labor and to the balance of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. He does not pay any duty on his crop.

Mr. McMASTER. You have accorded one privilege to the manufacturers which is absolutely denied to agriculture in America.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not denied to them at all. It is not denied to any person or corporation. The only thing is that there is no commodity which the farmers manufacture here and ship abroad.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me give the Senator an illustration. This year, according to the quotations, on No. 1 northern wheat the Canadian farmers received, up to the 12th of September, 10 or 12 cents more a bushel than the American farmer, and since that time 20 or 25 cents more, and we had 42 cents a bushel tariff protection on wheat all the time.

Mr. SMOOT. Those figures are disputed by the records of the Commerce Department. I have heard them stated before, but they are disputed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator please let me go on?

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand the explanation, in answer to the question of the Senator from Iowa, why wheat is selling at so much higher in Canada than in the United States, with a tariff on it of 42 cents a bushel. I wanted the explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. The figures of the Commerce Department do not show that to be the case.

SOME COMPLAINTS

Complaints against the tariff may be scheduled:

First. The tariff does not protect agriculture because agriculture has a surplus for export.

Second. Agriculture sells in a free trade (world) market and buys in a protected market.

Third. Agriculture is compelled to pay excessive prices for manufactured commodities, all protected, and gets no protection on what it sells, farm products, at low prices.

Fourth. Protection of manufactures robs agriculture of foreign markets for agricultural products.

Fifth. Protection is responsible for the decline in prices of farm products and the value of farm property.

Sixth. The tariff has deprived the farmer of the purchasing power of his dollar.

Seventh. The economic equality of the farmer must be restored by taking from the manufacturer the protection he enjoys.

Eighth. Therefore, in the interest of agriculture, the present tariff schedules must be lowered at once.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not understand that to be the statement of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER] at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I am taking now the general complaints. I am not taking them from the Senator's statement, but some 20 or more articles in which that very position is taken.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not seen any such articles. My understanding is that the complaint is that the rates are too high, not that all protection should be taken away. The resolution we are considering does not provide that the protective system shall be destroyed. It simply provides that the rates shall be lowered.

Mr. SMOOT. I started out by saying that I wanted to enumerate in detail all the complaints I have gathered from the press of the country, and these are the six principal complaints which I found in the press of the country and, I will say also, in letters which I have received.

Here are the eight principal reasons, the eight indictments, put forward by some agricultural groups and some Senators representing constituencies hitherto stout defenders of the doctrine of protection. It is my purpose to examine each indictment briefly and test each one by logic and facts.

THE SURPLUS ARGUMENT

Our foreign trade—and by that I mean in this instance our export trade—presupposes a surplus for export. The Department of Commerce is spending millions of public dollars every year discovering and developing foreign markets on the supposition that there is an American surplus for export. This surplus is not confined to agriculture nor to farm products. There is a surplus in many lines of manufactures. During the calendar year 1926 the domestic surplus of manufactures exported was valued at $1,956,118,000, while the surplus of crude and manufactured foodstuffs and animals for export was valued at only $838,082,000. For the calendar year ending December 31, 1927, the relative surplus for export was about the same, with perhaps a slight advantage to surplus of manufactures. Manufacturers have exactly the same surplus problems to solve as the farmers.

In defense of the surplus argument it is claimed by some that the tariff does not protect the farmer if he has a surplus, because the price of the quota exported controls the price of the quota sold in the home or domestic markets. The facts of experience prove the contrary. The domestic price of exported farm products and of manufactured goods is usually lower abroad than at home, and this very fact is one of the complaints low-tariff advocates and freetraders lodge against American manufacturers and American protection.

The surplus, neither of agriculture nor manufactures, for export, does not always control the domestic price sold in the American markets. The export price of wheat, as well as of domestic woolen and cotton manufactures, sold in foreign markets, is almost invariably lower than the price in the domestic or home markets. There is a good reason for this; but that is another story.

The existence of a surplus for export, either of farm products or of manufactured commodities, does not rob the farmer or the manufacturer of the benefit of the tariff. It does not make the tariff inoperative so far as the domestic market is concerned. The purpose of a protective tariff is to preserve the American market, as far as possible, for the American producer and manufacturer. This is accomplished if the import duty is sufficiently high on each competitive commodity to compel the importer or the foreign producer and manufacturer, to pay well for the privilege of selling in the American markets.

If, as is claimed by some, the tariff does not operate for the benefit of the American farmer, because of a surplus for export, why did so many farm associations and agricultural groups in 1922 insist upon a restoration of import duties on all farm products? Why have the growers of so many farm products, since 1922, petitioned the Tariff Commission for an increase in import duties under the flexible tariff? The duties on butter, cheese, wheat, and wheat flour have been increased by presidential proclamation in response to petitions from farmers. Petitions on other products of the American farms are pending before the Tariff Commission; among them, one from the growers of corn, and the producers of vegetable oils, growers of tomatoes and onions, and producers of peanuts.

FOREIGN MARKET ARGUMENT

It is often stated that the tariff is unfair to agriculture because agriculture is compelled to buy in a protected market and sell in a free trade (world) market. This is not true. The farmer sells most of his produce in a protected market, and buys in a protected market. Between 80 to 95 per cent of American farm products are sold in the American or protected markets. Outside of wheat, cotton, and perhaps one or two other articles, practically all of the products of the American farms find their markets in the United States. In fact, most of the American farmers sell nothing in foreign markets, depending entirely upon the home markets. These home markets are rich in their purchasing power, almost entirely because they are protected against foreign invasion. Since practically all of the products of the American farms (outside of two or three commodities) are sold in the American markets, I would like to ask why should American farmers and growers sacrifice their richest domestic and home markets for distant foreign markets? Neither the surplus argument nor the foreign-market argument justify the adoption of the resolution before us, committing the Senate to an immediate lowering of the tariff schedules.

EXCESSIVE PRICES

True, the farmer buys in a protected market; but nearly all the ordinary farm commodities the farmer buys are on the free list. The tariff, therefore, can not possibly add to the farmers' burdens as consumers, in strictly farm operations. The declaration is made by some that the tariff adds millions (often it is said billions) to the prices of domestic commodities the farmers buy. This is simply absurd. There is not a particle of evidence to prove the claim. It is significant that the guesses as to the "tariff burden" on farmers, vary according to the imagination and exaggeration of the allegator.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator let me get through with my speech? I would like to get it into the RECORD consecutively, and I hope Senators will study it.

In his address before the annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation in Chicago, December 7, 1925, President Coolidge well said:

> Of the $1,530,000,000 of goods paying imports (in 1924) $780,000,000 was upon agricultural products levied solely to protect the farmer, including animal and dairy products, grain, flax, wool, sugar, nuts, citrus fruits, and many others. Thus 80 per cent of our imports either come in free or pay a duty to protect the farmer. This must be further increased by $250,000,000 more of imported luxuries. * * * These items can not affect the prosperity of the farmer.

This brings the total of imports up to 88 per cent which are either free, or luxuries, or protected to help the farmer, and leaves only 12 per cent of our imports upon which the agricultural industry pays any part of the tariff.

In his message to Congress December last—1927—President Coolidge said:

Everything the farmer uses in farming is already on the free list. Nearly everything he sells is protected. It would seem to be obvious that it is better for the country to have the farmer raise food to supply the domestic manufacturer than the foreign manufacturer. In one case our country would have only the farmer; in the other it would have the farmer and the manufacturer. * * * The largest and best and most profitable market for the farmer in the world is our domestic market. Any great increase in manufactured imports means the closing of our plants. Nothing could be worse for agriculture.

It is impossible to accurately estimate just what excess prices the farmer may be compelled to pay for domestic goods because of the tariff on manufactured imported goods. He pays no excess price if there is no import duty on the foreign competing article. Whatever excess over the foreign price he may pay for the domestic article is governed wholly by the excess of domestic wages and cost of production. This is made up to the purchasing farmer by the high purchasing power of the wage earners in the protected industrial centers. A home market near the farm gives the farmer a far better price for his products than a foreign market far distant from the farm.

It is argued by some that the tariff permits American manufacturers to combine and extort excessive prices from the farmers. On the contrary, domestic competition, which has been severe for three years, has steadily reduced manufacturers' profits and lowered the price level of all manufactured goods.

RESTRICTING EXPORTS

It is often claimed that the tariff restricts foreign markets for American agricultural products, and therefore the tariff on manufactured commodities should be lowered in order that foreign countries, especially Europe, may buy more American agricultural products. It is argued that if the United States purchased more European manufactured commodities Europe would have a higher purchasing power for the purchase of American farm products. Admitting that Europe might have more money, it is not at all certain that it would consume more American agricultural products.

The slight decline in exports of domestic food products to Europe is not due to the tariff on imported manufactured goods but to the rapid recovery of agricultural production in Europe and elsewhere. During the calendar year 1926 imports of raw and manufactured foodstuffs and animals were some $838,000,000—equal approximately to 1925. This figure was far in excess of pre-war years. Exports during the war were abnormal.

Lowering of the tariff on manufactured goods will not gain a larger foreign market for American food, but would lose the farmer his rich American market.

ABOUT PRICES

There is no part of this important economic problem more deceptive and misleading than the matter of relative prices. "Price" is relative "value" expressed in terms of the unit of monetary measure, which in this country is the dollar. Value is a relative term; so is price. Both vary under the influence of many factors, not the least of which is the variation of the unit of measure, the dollar. The vital thing to all engaged in trade and commerce is the exchange value or purchasing power of the dollar. War and paper-money inflation that always accompanies war has a vital influence on the exchange value or purchasing power of the dollar. Paper-money inflation took place in nearly all countries, including the United States during the World War, and it has not yet disappeared.

This varying value or purchasing power of the dollar made the dollar of 1919 and 1920 a very different dollar from either 1914 or 1927. Hence prices and values in the 1920 dollar were much higher than when measured in 1914 or the 1927 dollar. Values and prices were excessively high in 1919 and 1920, because of war paper inflation. This rise and fall in farm values and prices had nothing to do with the tariff, otherwise the promoters of the resolution before us must explain why values and prices were highest in 1919 and 1920, under a low tariff. This variation in the dollar must be taken into consideration when the price argument is offered.

High prices and values are manifestations of a dollar of low purchasing power. It will be observed that the trend of prices followed the volume of issues of paper money. Prices were highest in 1919 and 1920, when the volume of Federal notes was the largest. Senators who undertake to attribute both the high prices of farm products in 1919 and 1920 and the low prices of 1921 and 1922 as well as the apparent gain and loss of farm-property values to the tariff have a problem far beyond ordinary reason or logic. This offers no excuse for an immediate lowering of the tariff.

THE FARMER'S DOLLAR

Many point to the decline of the purchasing power of the "farmer's dollar" as proof of the inefficiency of the tariff when applied to agriculture. The farmer's dollar is precisely the same kind of dollar as the manufacturer uses. There is no "farmer's dollar" and "manufacturer's dollar." All are the same, for we have a national money system wherein the dollar is just as good in one State as in another. There was a time when this desirable situation did not prevail. The manufacturer's dollar will buy no more of the same commodity than will the farmer's dollar. The word "dollar" means the same thing the country over under similar conditions. It declines in purchasing power just as much in New York or Pennsylvania as in Iowa, Nebraska, or South Dakota. It is economic fallacy and political claptrap to prejudice the West against the East by talking about a "farmer's dollar" as distinguished from a manufacturer's dollar. This was tried in greenback days and in the battle of 1896 without success.

The tariff has not deprived the farmer of the purchasing power of his dollar; but, on the contrary, has helped to preserve and restore its purchasing power in all sections of the country alike. A lowering of the tariff on manufactured goods will make it far more difficult for the American farmers to get any dollars whatever.

ECONOMIC EQUALITY

It is claimed that the tariff in operation has disturbed the "economic equality" of the farmers and manufacturers, and that the tariff protecting and favoring the latter must be lowered to restore the former equilibrium. No act of Congress can equalize or stabilize the relative values of farm products and manufactured commodities nor stabilize the relative values of any two or more agricultural products. It is impossible to establish by law how many bushels of wheat will exchange for a suit of clothes, or how many bushels of corn will exchange for a hayrake. With or without a tariff these exchanges or relative values are governed by economic laws and trade conditions wholly outside the tariff. Congress can not compel the manufacturer of a hayrake to sell it for so many bushels of wheat or corn, nor compel the farmer to exchange so many bushels of wheat for so many pounds of sugar. Congress can not permanently fix prices or exchange values; it has never undertaken it except during the World War; and even then many think it was a mistake, if not a blunder. A lowering of the tariff on manufactured goods will not have the slightest effect in establishing "economic equality" between agriculture and manufactures.

WHY MANUFACTURES ALONE?

The resolution before us declares that "the United States Senate favors an immediate lowering of tariff schedules." While it does not say so, obviously it means on manufactured goods alone, for no one has heard of a suggestion from the promoters of the resolution that the schedules on farm products shall be lowered. Why lower the tariff on manufactured goods and not on agricultural products? If protection is to be denied manufacturers, it should be denied agriculture. If protection as a national policy does not benefit and protect agriculture, it must be equally ineffective to manufacturers; yet the author of this resolution and those defending it will not consent to such a program, thus admitting that the tariff does benefit the farmer. Otherwise, why not repeal all farm duties?

THE REVENUE QUESTION

While the tariff now brings in only about one-fifth of the annual revenue of the Federal Government, it plays an important part in the fiscal operations of the Treasury. As direct taxes are gradually reduced, the tariff may play a relatively more important part. The tariff of 1922 has been bringing in approximately $600,000,000 to the Federal Treasury. A reduction of, say 10 per cent in duties on manufactures, or a still further reduction as proposed by the authors of this resolution, will reduce customs duties millions of dollars annually. It is not impossible that some form of indirect taxation would be necessary to make up the loss in customs duties. Why exchange an indirect for a direct tax? Why shift a part of the burden from importers and foreign manufacturers to the shoulders of the American taxpayers?

SOURCES OF AGITATION

What are the main sources of this agitation for tariff reduction? Certainly it does not come from a majority of the farmers themselves, for the farmers, as a rule, favor a protective tariff. There is plenty of evidence to indicate that agricultural groups are being used by other groups to pull the latter's chestnuts out of the fire. It can not be possible that the corn growers of the Middle West or wheat growers of South Dakota, the State which the author of this resolution represents in part, who depend upon the American markets for the sale of a very large part of their products, are willing to see their home markets ruined by a lowering of the tariff on manufactured commodities. It is not possible that the smaller farmers, who depend upon the industrial centers in a dozen Middle West States for the sale of almost their entire crops are anxious to see those markets ruined. What is behind this agitation against the protective tariff?

It is significant that since about 1920 more than $10,000,000,000 in private American money has been loaned to foreign governments and industrials; perhaps $6,000,000,000 to Europe alone. These private American investors are perfectly willing to have the tariff lowered in order that the European private debts owing them may be paid off by the sale of foreign manufactured goods in the markets of the United States. At the same time they appear to be perfectly willing to cancel the European war debts owing the United States Treasury, and now amounting to some $10,000,000,000. To these gentlemen with international minds American industries appear to be of secondary importance. I am forcibly reminded of that bit of Biblical wisdom: "Where your treasure is there will your heart be also." Every million dollars of private American capital invested in European industrial securities is a powerful argument in favor of lowering the tariff.

Also, it is significant that the joint committee on agriculture, appointed by the National Conference Board and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, reports that—the steady extension of tariff protection to manufacturing industries, and particularly the increase in the tariff level in post-war years, has on the whole affected agriculture unfavorably in comparison with manufacturing industry.

Discussing the relative merits of foreign and domestic markets for the farmers, this report further states that—we have raised a tariff wall against those foreign manufactured products which we could not produce as cheaply as foreign manufacturers—

And—

the ability of European markets to purchase American farm products has diminished—

Further, that—it may be questioned, however, whether this expansion of the domestic market has more than offset the relative narrowing of the foreign market, especially in recent years—the principal effect of the protective tariff upon the American farmer is to restrict the market for those products of which he produces a surplus above domestic needs.

And that—

This report further states that the high level of wages and the extraordinary consuming power of the American people—are the result of the high productive power of unprotected manufacturing industries rather than of the tariff in protected industries.

In other words, this joint committee of two supposed American organizations, one of which is composed of American business men and many manufacturers, deliberately urge a reduction of the tariff to help the farmers obtain a larger foreign market, at the expense of the thousands of American industries depending on the tariff for industrial life. The tariff is not for the few large industries which this report says "do not need the tariff," but for the thousands of American industries scattered all over the country, even in Iowa, Kansas, Illinois, Indiana, the Dakotas, and Nebraska. It is inconceivable that an organization like the Chamber of Commerce of the United States should indorse such a plan as is proposed by the report of this Joint Committee on Agriculture.

Against this report, in favor of the reduction of the tariff, let me quote from the report of the Congressional Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, October 15, 1921, at a time when the agricultural crisis was most acute and the facts near at hand. This commission reported:

The (agricultural) crisis was not confined to this country. The avalanche of declining prices and its hardships, sacrifices, and losses involved the whole world * * *. In the United States every industry and every class of people were involved in the avalanche of descending prices. The turn in the tide from optimism, expansion, speculation, and extravagance to the reaction of deflation and depression occurred about the middle of 1920.

This commission reported that not only the farmers but "every industry and every class of people" were involved. Observe that all this was under the operation of a Democratic low tariff.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McMASTER. As I understand the statement of the distinguished Senator from Utah, we would be led to believe that this depression was along rather equal lines. Will the Senator point to any great industrial business in the United States——

Mr. SMOOT. I am afraid the Senator has not been here and heard all of my remarks.

Mr. McMASTER. I heard very distinctly the statement that the Senator made since I came into the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but that occurred about the middle of 1920.

Mr. McMASTER. Nineteen hundred and twenty?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McMASTER. And agricultural valuations at that time were deflated by $20,000,000,000. They have never returned; but the valuations upon the industries of the United States have been increased billions of dollars. There is not a particle of truth in the statement that all industry suffered to the same degree that agriculture suffered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not want to be led into that, but the Senator seems to want me to go.

Just take one State of the Union—and I will not name it. Over 100 banks in that State failed. Why? Uncultivated lands advanced in that market until they were running as high as $400 an acre.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just wait a minute, until I finish this sentence. It had not been two years before that land was worth $50 an acre. I am telling the Senator in regard to a State that I know about.

Mr. McMASTER. The Senator is referring to Iowa; is he not?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am not referring to Iowa at all. Today I do not think they could get $100 an acre for those lands. Whose fault was it? Was it the fault of the tariff? No. People went wild, that is all; and in this case, as in every case in the history of the world, there will be a basis of conservatism reached at some time or other. Wherever there are inflations it is fine business while going up, but it is mighty hard coming down.

Mr. McMASTER. Agricultural value or any other value is dependent upon income; and I suppose that when wheat dropped from $2.26 to 50 cents a bushel, and corn dropped from $1.75 to 20 cents a bushel, it was the result of speculation? Is that what the Senator means by the farmers going wild in speculation?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I was speaking of one lot of bankers in one State of the Union, and I think I could refer to others. I referred only to what happened in one State, and I know that it happened.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator promised to yield to me. Will he yield now for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. The question of land values applies more to Iowa than to any other State, because the lands there reached the highest point in value.

Mr. SMOOT. But the percentages were not nearly as high there as they were in some of the other States. Your land was cultivated lands while the lands I refer to were not.

Mr. BROOKHART. The land in Iowa never did reach the high price of the average value of any other kind of property in the United States. The average ratio was 241 and 230 is as high as Iowa land ever got.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not referring to Iowa, although I do know that there was a tremendous inflation in Iowa and in every other State of the Union.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have just pointed out that there was less inflation of land in Iowa or any other State than there was of manufactured products generally.

Mr. SMOOT. I heard from the lips of an ex-Member of this body the story of the experience he had, and I know what the situation was if he told it correctly.

Mr. BROOKHART. There was not 5 per cent of the Iowa land sold in the speculative market, not 5 per cent of it; and while Iowa land went down two and a half billion dollars railroad stocks went up $3,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator makes that statement, and I can not say "yes" or "no" to it, because I have not looked up the value of the railroad stocks, and I can not say "yes" or "no" except about things that I do know about.

In 1925 President Coolidge appointed a conference to investigate agricultural conditions. It reported in its recommendations for a remedy:

> The livestock industry is suffering through lack of protection from competition with hides and meats from foreign countries, * * * while other agricultural enterprises are suffering from lack of proper tariff protection. * * * There is need of protecting our various agricultural commodities by adequate tariffs on foreign products that come into competition with them.

The remedy for the agricultural situation was more protection.

I will say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, now as before, if the agricultural interests want increased protection they can have it just as soon as the tariff is taken up for consideration.

Mr. McMASTER. I believe that; and the remedy you gave them in this protective tariff bill has given them an 89-cent dollar.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that statement can not be substantiated. If it had not been for this protection, God only knows what the dollar would have been worth.

Mr. CARAWAY. It would have been worth a hundred cents.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator says; but I am afraid it would have been nearer 10 cents.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. EDGE. I have just entered the Chamber. I heard the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] make a statement as to the comparative value of land and securities in Iowa. In a speech made by the former Governor of Indiana, James P. Goodrich, a few months ago, he made this statement:

> Isn't it time that some loyal son of Iowa was calling attention to the fact that the per capita wealth of Iowa in 1926 was $3,539, nearly double the average of the United States?

I was so taken by that fact that I thought perhaps the Senator would like to have it called to his attention.

Mr. BROOKHART. But that statement does not give the amount of mortgages that New Jersey and New York hold on Iowa land.

Mr. EDGE. This refers to the per capita worth.

Mr. BROOKHART. But it does not give the per capita debt.

Mr. EDGE. When a man owes a mortgage, he is not worth the amount of that mortgage. He owes it to somebody else.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the property in Iowa. That is the amount of the values out there. There is nothing about the mortgages in that statement.

Mr. EDGE. Then the statement of the ex-Governor of Indiana is incorrect, is it?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I read it exactly as it appears.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is vitally incorrect. He does not know what he is talking about at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Sometimes people do know what they are talking about, but others think they do not.

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES

Perhaps the American people, even the members of the organization itself, are ignorant of the methods and activities of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States—a splendid and useful establishment if operating on purely American lines. But there is evidence that this organization has adopted un-American and possibly unwise methods in ascertaining and reporting what it calls public sentiment. I recall that in 1922, when the tariff was being framed, the chamber of commerce put forth one of its "referendums" attempting to show that the Republican plan of protection restoration was all wrong and should be changed. It insisted upon lower rates all along the line, much to the embarrassment of the responsible framers of the bill.

INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The August 8, 1927, number of the United States commerce reports of the Department of Commerce contains an interesting and significant article on the recent fourth Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce at Stockholm, Sweden, June 27 to July 2.

From this article it appears that the purposes of the International Congress are—> to develop international trade, to suppress those barriers which hamper commercial exchanges, to strengthen the bonds which link the various nations together, to counteract the causes of economic conflict, and thereby contribute to the maintenance of peace.

This is a quotation from one of its brochures.

> Trade barriers—

In the language of Mr. Silas H. Strawn, one of the American delegates to the congress at Stockholm, are—> those arbitrary national restraints on the free movement of goods, capital, and services which not only restrain trade and traders but limit the economical production and distribution of goods, capital, and services to the detriment of the peoples affected by the restraint.

This is a quotation from Mr. Strawn's address quoted in the August 8 Commerce Reports, at page 328.

The article in this number of Commerce Reports states:

> The resolution originally reported by the drafting committee of the trade-barriers group at Stockholm, on the subject of import tariffs was discarded, upon objection being raised, and a substitute paragraph was adopted which affirmed the "adhesion of the business world to the declarations of the Geneva Conference" on this question.

This quotation is from Commerce Reports of August 8, at page 329.

What were the declarations of the Geneva Conference on the subject of import tariffs?

On pages 31, 32, and 33 of the final report of the proceedings and resolutions of the Geneva Conference will be found these declarations (these quotations are paraphrased, retaining the meaning):

> (1) Attempts by nations to stimulate industries artificially have resulted in losses and sacrifices to the nations trying them, and burdened the consumers who were obliged to pay more for the products of the protected industry.

Senators now in the Chamber can remember when the tariff bill of 1922 was under consideration in this body. At that time this Chamber was crowded with foreign goods imported into this country on which profits of over a thousand per cent were made by the importer. Because they bought the goods cheaply, did they sell them cheaply? If we had free trade to-day, we would have exactly the same position. Imported goods are not sold here by the American merchant for less than the same quality and class of goods made in this country are sold. They make more profit out of them.

Only a month or so ago, in talking here with a purchaser for one of the great concerns in New York, he told me they were going to purchase that year two-thirds of all of their commodities in foreign countries and one-third in America. I said, "Why put it in percentages? Why do you do that? How much do you make? Is there any difference in what you make on selling the goods?" He said, "Of course we make higher profits on foreign goods than we do upon domestic goods." What if we had free trade? Would there be any limit? Only the limit that would be imposed by the foreign country; and as between the American manufacturer and the foreign manufacturer, I am for the American manufacturer.

> (2) Excessive protection defeats its own object, reduces national production and purchasing power, permits high profits at home, uneconomically stimulates exports, and creates artificial competition in foreign markets.
> (3) Governments should immediately prepare plans for removing or diminishing these trade barriers that gravely hamper trade.
> (4) Tariffs are not a matter of purely domestic interest, but generally influence the trade of the world.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Who said that?

Mr. SMOOT. This is the report of an American delegate to the Congress at Stockholm.

> (5) The time has come to put an end to the increase of tariffs and to move in the opposite direction.

It is clear that the Geneva International Economic Conference in May last headed in the direction of the removal of all import tariffs eventually. While the American delegates did not and could not commit the United States to any policy, it is fair to assume that the final report of the Geneva Conference met the approval of the American delegates. The American delegates were: Henry M. Robinson, Norman H. Davis, John O'Leary, Alonzo E. Taylor, and Dr. Julius Klein, of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I am interested in knowing whether the Mr. Robinson mentioned there concurred in that recommendation.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that he was chairman of the subcommittee, but I am not sure. I know that he was a member of the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I did not get the name the Senator last read.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It was Mr. Robinson, of California.

Mr. WILLIS. No; I mean the last name read.

Mr. SMOOT. It was Mr. Klein, of the Department of Commerce.

The American delegates made a report to President Coolidge, in which these observations are found on pages 2, 4, and 6:

(1) Within the limits fixed by the agenda, discussion revolved around European problems; nevertheless the general resolutions for the most part have world-wide application.

(2) Fundamental policies of national economy, such as free trade versus protection, and nationalization of resources, were not included in the deliberations of the Geneva conference. Tariff levels are of less importance than the "rationalization of tariffs." (This phrase is not defined, but presumably it means tariffs low enough to be acceptable to the whole world, acceptable to the reason of all nations.)

(3) There were evolved out of Geneva definite formulæ for the relief of difficulties that still militate against international commerce. (One was a removal of protective tariffs.)

(4) The Geneva conference declared against all forms of direct or indirect subsidies; that is, government aid.

(5) The American delegates finally report on page 6:

"We feel that within the limits fixed for discussion and recommendation, the (Geneva) conference has pointed ways for the removal or modification of obstacles to the natural flow of international trade, and for the lowering of costs of production. We believe if the formula evolved should be followed it will be beneficial to the peoples not only of Europe but of the world."

It is perfectly clear that the Geneva International Economic Conference frowned upon import tariffs, protection, and all methods of promoting and protecting domestic industries; that it recommended the removal of import tariffs; and that it meant to apply these recommendations to all nations, including the United States.

It is also perfectly clear that the report of the American delegation to the Geneva conference indorsed the general recommendations of the conference itself, including the removal of all "economic barriers" which, in the language of the conference itself, includes import tariffs.

It is also perfectly clear that the International Chamber of Commerce in session at Stockholm, Sweden, in June and July last, indorsed the position of the Geneva conference in the matter of import tariffs.

The fundamental principles discussed at Geneva and Stockholm may not have been directly free trade versus protection, but they were essentially the same thing.

It is very significant that Sir Arthur Balfour was one of the British delegates to the Stockholm Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce. The main points of his address will be found in Commerce Report of August 8, at the top of page 331. He said:

In the resolutions of the Geneva conference is to be found the advice of the most authoritative body of the world experts * * * as to the direction in which the economic policies of the world ought to develop. The evils they wish to remove cause not only loss but friction since they affect not only the growth of trade but international good will.

Doubtless Sir Arthur forgot that already Great Britain grants subsidies to its national shipping.

Sir Arthur commended the declaration of the Geneva conference in opposition to trade discriminations of all sorts. Doubtless he forgot that already Great Britain has a decided tariff preference over all other countries in her trade with Canada, Australia, and all dependencies coming under the British imperial tariff system. The tariff rates in Canada, Australia, and other British possessions imposed on British goods are less than on American goods and commodities, or the commodities of any other country.

These observations are for the purpose of calling public attention to powerful forces working to break down the American protective tariff. To them must be added American investments abroad, especially in Europe.

A PERIL TO FARMERS

This resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota, presents a peril to the United States I hope not fully realized by its author, or its supporters; and the greatest peril of all is to the farmers.

Mr. McMASTER. Oh, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I said I "hoped."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may not think the Geneva conference has anything to do with it, but when it comes to final action——

Mr. McMASTER. That has not anything to do with the square deal between the farmer and the manufacturer.

Mr. SMOOT. The whole protective tariff has something to do with it. Without it, the farmer would not have what he has to-day. Destroy the manufacturers, and put all the 20,000,000 people they employ on the street, and see what would happen.

Mr. McMASTER. There is not a word or syllable in that resolution that you can even conceive as being meant to destroy a single industry in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator would not want to have that apply to agricultural products, because I saw in a letter to his own State where he said it did not apply to them. He does not want that changed.

Mr. McMASTER. I think I said in my remarks here on the floor of the Senate that the tariffs on industrial products would be decreased by 25 or 30 per cent, and still be far above the level of the schedule that has been accorded to agriculture, and thus that would increase the purchasing power of agriculture.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from Utah in this connection to the fact that this resolution, to put it in its exact language, declares in favor of the "lowering of tariff schedules." Of course, that means all tariff schedules.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McMASTER. It does not so state.

Mr. BRUCE. It would be impossible to lower the tariff schedules on some industries at the present time without destroying them.

Mr. SMOOT. While the Senator is on this, I will read part of a telegram I have in my hand:

That the Associated Commercial Clubs of Black Hills oppose the resolution offered in the United States Senate by Senator McMASTER urging the enactment of a law at this session of Congress looking to the lowering of the tariff rates now in force, and that the Senator be respectfully requested to abandon same.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, the sequel to that telegram is the fact that the distinguished Senator from Utah owns a sugar factory in the Black Hills of South Dakota, and he may have informed them that the resolution endangered the sugar business. Those people may have been under the impression that they would lose the sugar factory if the pending resolution should pass.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not like to dispute a Senator's word, but I have not sent a word to South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. Propaganda has been distributed to the effect that that would be the result if this resolution should pass the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the first place, I have no sugar factory. I own 440 shares of sugar stock. I offered to sell it to Mr. La Follette some two years ago. If the Senator from South Dakota wants to buy it, he can buy it.

Mr. McMASTER. I do not want to relieve you of that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's intimation was that it was my sugar factory. I am interested in the production of sugar, just as I am in every other product of South Dakota; and so the Senator ought to be.

Mr. McMASTER. I am glad to have the Senator interested in the affairs of South Dakota, in the sugar factories there, and we hope he will establish more.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not established any.

Mr. McMASTER. When the Senator mentions a certain telegram coming from there——

Mr. SMOOT. It is a telegram handed to me by Mr. James L. Wright. It is not to me at all.

Mr. McMASTER. The telegram has never been received in my office.

Mr. SMOOT. This was not sent to the Senator; it was sent to James L. Wright. I knew nothing about it until about half an hour ago.

Mr. McMASTER. I will say this: That I have received probably hundreds of letters from farmers in South Dakota that are very much in favor of this resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me tell the Senator one thing: Begin to tear down the policy of protection and your farmers in South Dakota will be singing another song.

Mr. McMASTER. There is no one tearing down the policy of protection.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator is doing by his resolution; that would be the ultimate effect.

The very thought of an attack on the tariff and a weakening of the walls of protection is bringing a slow-down to many lines of industry and a reduction of the employed, not to say slight reductions of wages. While general prosperity followed a restoration of protection in 1922, and unemployment largely disappeared, since the inauguration of an international movement to remove all "economic barriers," including the American tariff and a backfire of free trade or a lower tariff from our own country, there has been a slowing down of many industries and a fear of the future.

Added to this during the last two years excessive domestic competition and excessive State, municipal, and local taxes have so discouraged many manufacturers as to compel them to "take in sail."

Even under the present tariff rates foreign importations of steel and iron products, glassware, cement, and many other commodities have been so large as to alarm American manufacturers. Imports of cotton and woolen clothing have brought not simply fair competitive conditions but unfair underselling in many American markets. The shelves of many American stores and department establishments have been loaded with foreign goods, produced at much less cost and raised to a figure in the American markets just below American cost of production. Profits on such imported foreign goods are greater than on similar American goods. All this is added to domestic competition and high taxes until a slow-down has been forced. Not a lowering of the tariff but higher tariffs in many cases is the remedy not only for industrial but agricultural ills. American farmers are already suffering from a declining American market, due to the agitation for what might be falsely called "tariff reform."

ABOUT WAGES

It is not necessary to explain to the country or to the author of this resolution and its supporters what a high wage scale and a high purchasing power in the United States means to American farmers. It is not necessary to show what the difference in the average scale of wages is in the several industrial countries.

The International Labor Office, in its Labor Review of October, 1927, prints a comparison of "real" wages in various large cities of the world. Here are the figures from a labor point of view and from a labor source:

Index numbers of comparative real wages in various cities, July 1, 1927

City	General average index numbers
	Based on food only	With allowance for rent
Philadelphia	178	178
Ottawa	156	154
Copenhagen	106	106
Dublin	102	110
London	100	100
Stockholm	92	99
Amsterdam	87	87
Berlin	67	62
Madrid	54
Paris	53
Milan	52	53
Brussels	48	52
Riga	48	53
Prague	46	49
Tallinn	46	47
Rome	43	45
Lodz	42	44
Vienna	41	46
Warsaw	37	38
Lisbon	31

These are official figures from each of the countries. Is it possible under conditions of that kind that industry in America can maintain itself without a protective tariff?

Philadelphia, which represents the United States, is the highest of all in the scale of "real wages." It is 78 points above London, 111 points above Berlin, and 125 points above Paris. Based on food alone, the real wages in the United States are twice as high as in Germany and nearly three times as high as in other countries. It is impossible for American industries to compete with similar foreign industries in the domestic markets without adequate protection.

The greatest obstacle to the gradual recovery of the American farming industry is a depression in manufacturing and a decrease in the demand for farm products, and thus a depression in prices. What folly for the farmers to urge a program that will add disaster to their present troubles.

A REAL FARM PROBLEM

I fully appreciate the sad experiences of many farmers and cattle raisers in the West, Northwest, and Southwest sections of the country. I am a western man myself, and know by personal observation the disasters that have been wrought in some States by the postwar conditions; but I can not be persuaded that a lowering of the tariff on manufactured goods, certainly not on agricultural products, will remedy the situation. If I could be so persuaded, I would apply the remedy or help in applying it.

The causes of the troubles among the farmers of the Middle West and Northwest and Southwest lie not with the tariff, but with war and postwar conditions. Land and crop values were greatly inflated between 1914 and 1919; they were bound to recede. It is true that farm and crop values after 1919 and 1920 declined more rapidly than other values, and that prices of agricultural products fell more rapidly than manufactured commodities; but the tariff had nothing to do with it.

The value of farm crops in 1927 was $8,428,626,000, as compared with $7,793,490,000 in 1926—a gain of more than $635,146,000 in one year. The corn crop in 1927 increased more than $285,000,000 over 1926, the barley crop increased more than $73,800,000 over 1926, while the cotton crop increased more than $330,700,000 over 1926. Wheat decreased in value about $10,000,000.

The agricultural problem is more a problem of cooperation and economic distribution or marketing than of the tariff. God knows I will help in every way, shape, and form to support legislation that will give them a fair chance in marketing their products in the world. A tinkering of the tariff will only make the situation worse; while economic laws and business cooperation are bound in time to restore the much-needed economic relations between agriculture and manufactures. Farm values and prices are bound to recover; in fact, are recovering slowly now.

I am painfully aware that many western and northwestern and southwestern farmers lost their farms; and that many banks holding farm property as security, failed. However, I am also painfully aware of the fact that this was largely due to the unwise purchase of high-priced farms, of inflated securities held by some banks, and the expectation that inflated prices would hold after the war. No such thing occurred after the Revolution, after the War of 1812, after the Civil War. Deflation and disasters on farms all over the country followed each of those wars. The same thing was bound to follow the World War.

I am convinced that farm conditions are slowly improving. Reports from Iowa, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and other States are encouraging and that farmers are paying off their old debts and enjoying a slowly rising income. Why lose what has been gained in two or three years by lowering the tariff and depriving the farmers of the only profitable market they have?

It is nonsense to charge the tariff with the loss of many millions, perhaps billions, in farm property since the inflated days of 1919 and 1920. Thousands of manufacturers suffered from inflation and inflated prices and values; and many lost everything and were put out of business. Those who survived were saved from the postwar collapse by a restoration of protection.

PROSPERITY

Some of our free-trade friends are inclined to question the presence of prosperity in the country. They are undertaking to demonstrate that protection is a failure, because there are unemployed, commercial failures, and, in spots, distress.

Unemployment is small as compared with 1921, before the Republicans came into power. The percentage of commercial failures was not as great in 1926 or 1927 as in 1914. Production has increased; wages, on the whole, have maintained a high level, personal incomes have increased, and greater prosperity has come to more people since 1922 and 1923 than in any other period of the country's history.

DO FARMERS NEED PROTECTION?

Despite the fact that American farmers can supply all the staple products needed in the United States, they face every year an influx of foreign-grown crops and other agricultural commodities. The Senator from South Dakota who offers this resolution forgets the heavy importations of crude agricultural products which come into direct competition with the products of American farmers. He does not mention the fact that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, agricultural imports were valued at more than $2,500,000,000. Millions of pounds of foreign butter, cheese, live hogs, live poultry, hides, beef and veal, pork, wool, rice, sugar, tomatoes, potatoes, lemons and fruits, and nuts were imported; and this country raises all of these commodities. Imports of competitive farm commodities in 1926–27 were valued at more than $1,500,000,000. The farmers need protection, and can not in fairness to themselves ask for immediate reduction of tariff schedules.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. I can not see any particular reason why the senior Senator from Utah should continually reiterate these statements in regard to the ruination of agriculture because of a lowering of tariff schedules upon industrial products.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's resolution does not say anything about industrial products.

Mr. McMASTER. It clearly has that in mind.

Mr. SMOOT. What will the American people think? What will Senators on the other side of the aisle think about that?

Mr. McMASTER. Would the Senator vote for the resolution if it were so amended? If the Senator is such a friend of agriculture, would he vote for the resolution if it were amended to apply only to industrial products?

Mr. SMOOT. How does the Senator mean?

Mr. McMASTER. That the tariff schedule should be lower only on industrial products. The Senator is a great friend of the farmer and of agriculture?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McMASTER. Would he be willing to vote for the resolution if we amended it to provide that the production should apply only to industrial schedules?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, it seems to me that is so begging the question that I think it is beneath the Senator even to make such a proposition.

Mr. McMASTER. I want to amend the resolution so the Senator from Utah will vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah will wait for the House of Representatives to pass a tariff bill, as the Constitution provides, and when it comes over here, if I am a member of the Finance Committee, I will use my best judgment on every rate, whether it be on industrial or farm products or any other product.

Mr. McMASTER. Will the Senator do as he did the last time in lowering the rates in practically all of the schedules on agricultural products for which the farmers were asking? That is what he succeeded in doing in his Finance Committee in 1921.

Mr. SMOOT. I deny the statement.

Mr. McMASTER. I have quoted the testimony.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; on milk and butter.

Mr. McMASTER. Milk and butter, hides and rice.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] were here. He came before the committee representing the tariff bloc in this body.

Mr. McMASTER. Yes; asking for a tariff on hides and it was denied him.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not denied by the committee. It was denied him by the very men whom the Senator from South Dakota expects to vote for his resolution, Senators on the other side of the Chamber. It was not denied by those on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was not a majority on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. There were just enough over there to do it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, with help from the other side.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it was very powerful.

Mr. SMOOT. Evidently it was so far as hides are concerned.

A BIT OF HISTORY

Mr. President, this is not the first time in American history that the tariff has been condemned by the West or South as a plan to enrich the East at the expense of other sections. On one occasion it led to nullification by a southern State, and a compromise tariff law to pacify the southern agricultural hostility was enacted. The distress of that period was almost equal to the financial disaster between 1817 and 1824, when all forms of industry languished and there was no market for agricultural products.

Mr. President, if you want to discover a replica of the resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota and the arguments offered by his supporters, read the celebrated report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Robert J. Walker, in 1846, condemning the protective tariff of 1842. Secretary Walker arraigned the manufacturers of the East as enjoying unfair advantage, in his opinion, at the expense of the agricultural West because of the tariff. Precisely the same arguments were advanced in 1846 that are advanced now in favor of a lowering of the tariff.

Reading that report now, one might imagine the supporters of protection in 1842 were engaged in a conspiracy to commit fraud, and that the manufacturers of the East were guilty of some crime against the people. The Secretary's language might well be termed savage. Now in 1927 the same arguments, the same savage attacks against the manufacturers are repeated.

Tariff reform, such as is suggested in the resolution before us, was tried in 1894, and resulted in failure. The farmers were told they were being robbed by the manufacturers. The agricultural groups were promised prosperity but were given hard times and a declining market for farm crops. In 1913 the farmers, having tried tariff reform in 1894 and failed to learn their lesson, tried tariff reform once more, and its promoters called it a "competitive tariff." The framers of this tariff placed many farm products, including wool, on the free list, and reduced the tariff on all others sufficiently to invite large foreign importations. Had it not been for the World War, this tariff of 1913 would have ruined not only manufactures but agriculture. With these lessons in mind, it is difficult to understand why the Senator from South Dakota or any agricultural group in the country can consistently urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. President, to my mind the national situation is altogether too serious to tell the country and the world that the United States Senate favors a lowering of all tariff schedules as a solution of the farm problem. It is difficult for me to measure the disastrous effect the adoption of this resolution by the Senate would have upon business, upon confidence, and upon credit. The very fear of a general lowering of the tariff might precipitate an industrial and business panic. The resolution contains nothing specific, no definite program upon which business might predicate a future policy. It is a threat, an attack in the dark, without a single redeeming feature. Its possibilities for good are negligible; its possibilities for mischief are boundless.

By the adoption of this resolution agriculturists will profit nothing; nay, will add more trouble to their unfortunate condition by alarming capital and credit, the two things the farmers most need right now.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. BRUCE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Unless the Senator from Maryland desires to ask a question, I wish to move an executive session and then ask the Senate to take a recess.

Mr. BRUCE. I merely wish to say a few words. It will not take me more than 10 minutes to say what I desire to say, and I should like to say it at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I regret that this resolution should be worded as it is. With a single amendment it would receive my support. I am not willing to commit myself to the position that there should be an immediate lowering of all tariff schedules, and that unquestionably is the import of the language of the resolution. There never has been a tariff measure since the Civil War, whether framed by the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, that has not been, more or less, protective in character. There has been no such thing as a tariff for revenue only. We have had a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, and we have had protective tariffs pure and simple, but never since the Civil War has a tariff measure been framed, even by the representatives of the Democratic Party in Congress, that those representatives have not acted, to a greater or lesser degree, upon the considerations which led Grover Cleveland to say on a memorable occasion: "It is not a theory but a condition that confronts us."

Last year the fact was developed that the great straw-hat manufacturing industry of Baltimore was about to go to the wall because of Italian competition. This state of things was laid before the Tariff Commission and the President, and, as a result of the investigation that was thereby initiated, the tariff duty on straw hats was increased to an extent that it was believed would afford proper protection to the straw-hat manufacturers of Baltimore and the State of Massachusetts.

The fact was brought to my attention at that time that a wage of 80 cents a day was being paid to the skilled straw-hat operative in Italy as compared to the wage of $6 a day which was being paid to a similar operative in Baltimore. I was also informed that one concern in the State of Massachusetts engaged in the manufacture of straw hats had, through Italian competition, recently lost the sum of $200,000. Now that the increased duty has been imposed on the importation of Italian straw hats, with the full approval and consent of the Democratic as well as the Republican members of the Tariff Commission, and with the approved of the President, is it, too, to be lowered as the result of the pending resolution?

I surely do not think it can be within the intent of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER] that there shall be a horizontal reduction of all tariff duties of every sort on imported commodities of all kinds. I am not willing to be put into the position of approving that, though, of course, I have always been a pretty orthodox Democrat in relation to the tariff.

Besides, I think it is premature to consider this resolution at this time. At the last session of the Senate there was a special tariff investigation committee appointed by it, and that committee is soon to report. One of the questions that have been considered by the committee, and most earnestly considered by it, is the question as to whether the power of fixing tariff duties should not be lodged exclusively in a reorganized tariff commission, subject to proper administrative standards supplied to it by Congress, in the first instance, and, perhaps, subject also to the final approval of Congress within some limited time after the duties fixed by it shall have been reported to Congress. In other words, one of the problems which that special committee is pondering is whether the tariff controversy should not cease absolutely and for all time to be the mere football of party politics and the fixing of tariff duties of all kinds be left, subject to the proper standards of administrative discretion which are necessary to make the delegation of authority valid, to a tariff commission with a sufficiently long tenure and liberal enough salaries to give its members the position of aloofness and dignity enjoyed by the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing transportation rates. The repeal of the flexible clause of the present tariff act would, of course, be one of the features of such an arrangement. Though we occasionally hear mutterings about the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we all know that next to the Supreme Court of the United States that body enjoys a larger measure of the confidence of the American people than does almost any other administrative body known to the Federal law.

I am not committing myself at this time to the proposition that the powers of the Tariff Commission should be so enlarged. That would not now be proper because the members of the special committee have not had a final interchange of views among themselves; but we shall have that interchange shortly. At the present time I think that I am justified in saying that the trend of opinion on the part of all the members of the committee, Republican and Democratic, has not been one of enmity to the plan. It seems to me, therefore, that the questions which have been discussed, and so ably discussed, this afternoon have been brought forward just a little prematurely, and that they might have been discussed even more intelligently and effectively a little later on, when the special tariff investigating committee, to which I have referred, shall have rendered its report.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES

Mr. DENEEN. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment the resolution (S. Res. 101) to continue the investigation of the matter of naval oil reserve leases and the activities of the Continental Trading Co. of Canada in connection therewith, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas in the Sixty-seventh Congress the Senate passed Senate Resolutions 282 and 294, which resolutions directed the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to investigate the entire subject of the leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources; and

Whereas said committee never completed said investigation, the same having been suspended because of the refusal of one Harry F. Sinclair to answer the questions of the committee, and said committee has never made any final report to the Senate; and

Whereas in the case of the United States against Harry F. Sinclair and Albert B. Fall it was disclosed upon the trial that a fraudulent corporation, known as the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, had been organized for the purpose of using the profits of its business in the bribing of public officials of the United States and for other dishonest, dishonorable, and illegal purposes; and

Whereas it was disclosed upon said trial that profits of said corporation were invested in Liberty bonds of the United States, and that only a portion of said Liberty bonds so invested had been definitely traced and accounted for, and that a large amount of Liberty bonds coming into the hands of said fraudulent corporation had been unaccounted for and unexplained: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to renew and to continue the investigation provided for in said Resolutions 282 and 294, and said resolutions are hereby renewed as fully and as completely as though they were herein fully set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee is specifically directed to make an investigation as to the transactions and activities of the said fraudulent corporation, the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, and it is specifically directed to trace all the Government bonds held and dealt in by said corporation, with the purpose of ascertaining the beneficiary or beneficiaries of all the illegal transactions connected with the fraudulent and dishonest sale or leasing of the said naval oil reserves.

The preamble was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 10, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Lord God, as we are summoned again to our sacred tasks, may we be mindful of the wide reaches of Thy goodness, which is the necessity of earth. Keep us from confusing moral principles and enable us to see, choose, and follow the best. May we be courageous enough to put first things first and worthy enough to bear the torch of truth up the hills of light. Let Thy Holy Spirit flood all hearts, dispel care, quiet fret, and smother fear. Father in Heaven, may we know that the best victories of any life are the victories won within a man's own heart. Help us to bear our responsibilities with integrity, humanity, and composure. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 7, 1928, was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 82. An act to continue commissioners in the Court of Claims.

ACQUISITION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 483, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

Following is the conference report and accompanying statement:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 483 having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
J. WILL TAYLOR,
FRITZ G. LANHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

HENRY W. KEYES,
SIMEON D. FESS,
HENRY F. ASHURST,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The amendment adopted to H. R. 483, by the Senate, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the Public Building Commission, to enter into contracts for the demolishing and removal of buildings on the lands to be acquired under the terms of said act in order to make the same ready for constructing the buildings authorized under the public buildings act approved May 25, 1926, and to grade the lands and plant trees to fit in the public-building plan now in process of development under the terms of said public buildings act. As all of this work must be done, we deemed this amendment proper and reasonable and have agreed to the same.

RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
J. WILL TAYLOR,
FRITZ G. LANHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, this is what is known as the triangle bill. The Senate saw fit to add an amendment in the nature of a new section to the bill, known as section 4, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission, to demolish the buildings when title is acquired thereto under the terms of this act and to charge the cost thereof to the appropriations authorized in this act. The total authorization in the act is $25,000,000, out of which all of this property must be acquired and the cost of demolishing the buildings paid. The conferees on the part of the House and the Senate, after a full and free conference, concluded that this was a necessary proposition; that these old buildings would have to be removed and that when removed all of that part of the ground that is not used immediately for buildings shall be put in decent shape, so that it will not be an eyesore to the people. It may be a great number of years before some parts of this land is used for public buildings, it being a question of just how fast Congress will make appropriations. Therefore we concluded this amendment was proper and saw no reason why it should not be adopted, so we agreed to it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not hear the reading of the Senate amendment. It is a short, new section, and I ask unanimous consent to have the Senate amendment read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

SEC. 4. That after title has been vested in the United States to any of the properties herein or heretofore authorized to be acquired or taken within the area embraced in this act, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, further authorized to enter into contracts for demolishing the buildings thereon, and for clearing and grading the land at such time and to such extent as he may deem proper, and to enter into contracts for plans and specifications for the architectural landscape treatment of the portion of the lands acquired which he may deem proper, with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission created by the act of March 1, 1919, to reserve for planting and for open spaces for the proper grouping of the Federal buildings which have heretofore been authorized or may hereafter be authorized to be constructed within the area embraced in this act, the expenditures on account thereof to be charged to the appropriations authorized under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes for the purpose of opposing the adoption of this amendment?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this Senate amendment involves the buildings that are in the so-called triangle which Congress has authorized to be purchased for not to exceed $25,000,000. Included in that triangle is the office building—erected within the last few years—of the Southern Railway Co. I am perfectly aware that a great many of the old, worn-out structures in the triangle will have to be torn down in order to make way for the new Government buildings which are to be erected, but I am not willing to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury—even though he might have the approval of the Public Buildings Commission—authority to tear down so useful and commodious an office structure as the Southern Railway Building. Anyone who is familiar with that office building knows it is constructed along plain, simple lines for utility and is one of the best office buildings in the city; and, I undertake to say, is a good deal better office building than a good many of those constructed with the ornate adornments that are approved by the Fine Arts Commission. I have read somewhere that simplicity is the crowning excellence of art, but that does not seem to appeal to the Fine Arts Commission. I would consider it a crime to tear down and demolish as well-constructed, as commodious, and as convenient an office building as the Southern Railway Building.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is not the gentleman confusing the Fine Arts Commission with the Public Buildings Commission?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. No; I know that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the terms of this Senate amendment, must secure the consent of the Public Buildings Commission. I know that all right, but I was just referring to the fact, gathered from observation I have made in Washington, that it seems to be the opinion of the Fine Arts Commission that nothing is artistic unless it is elaborately adorned.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to have the gentleman from Texas mention one fact to justify his very severe criticism of the Fine Arts Commission. I would like the gentleman to mention one building or structure anywhere which justifies that criticism.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Well, all right. I will refer to the District Building. Was not that building approved by the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think that was erected before the members of the present commission were appointed.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Well, I do not know, but I could cite a number of public buildings around the city of Washington, elaborately adorned, that I do not think compare as office buildings with the Southern Railway Building.

The reason I have taken the floor is that only last week one of the prominent Washington newspapers came out in an editorial and advocated that the Southern Railway Building be torn down and demolished. I am unwilling to vote for any measure which would permit that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield me two more minutes, so that the gentleman from South Carolina may ask me his question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Referring to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin as to anything the Fine Arts Commission had ever done which was subject to criticism, the gentleman will remember, I think, that in erecting the new courthouse here they went so far as to require the statue of Abraham Lincoln be taken down, boxed, and stored in a warehouse on the river front, and Congress actually had to pass an act to make them restore it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Congress first authorized the taking down of that statue.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a further interruption?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] said that I had asked the gentleman from Texas to mention anything ever done by the Fine Arts Commission which was subject to criticism. I asked what building or structure justified the criticism; and the gentleman from South Carolina suggests the statue of Abraham Lincoln. In answer to that suggestion, I remind the gentleman from Texas of the facts. The statue of Abraham Lincoln dates back to times soon after the Civil War. It was at the top of an unusually high column. Years after it was unveiled, the street boundary was changed, and the street so graded and lowered as to leave the column standing on a high mound. This mound and the long column made the statue appear entirely out of proportion.

The features could not be well seen. Accordingly Congress by law authorized the statue to be taken down and then subsequently by another law authorized it to be reerected, and it was reerected on a new pedestal and on a site several feet nearer the courthouse. The Fine Arts Commission did not arbitrarily direct the statue to be taken down. The law authorized that.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I was not discussing the statue of Abraham Lincoln, and the point I want to emphasize in conclusion is that if we authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission, to enter into contracts for the demolishing of these buildings situated within the triangle we ought to exempt from that authority the Southern Railway Building. It is entirely too good a building and cost too much money for Congress to take any sort of a chance of its being torn down and scrapped. For that reason I am opposed to the conference report and will vote against it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield me five minutes?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion made by my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is well taken, and in this connection I want the gentleman to remember something else. Right this side of the Southern Railway Building is the Post Office Department Building.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. This amendment deals with land acquired under the provisions of this act, and the Post Office Department Building is not acquired under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that; but I want to tell my colleagues what else there is in the minds of Washingtonians in this connection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; but it is not in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I want you to understand that the press says it has been agreed upon by the authorities that control such situations to demolish the Post Office Department Building within the next two years.

In my judgment, and in the judgment of a great many here, this is one of the most substantial, valuable, and picturesque public buildings within this city, and it ought not to be demolished. It ought to stand, and the money it would take to demolish it and build a new building would be money wasted, doubly wasted.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. Col. Paul Henderson, when he was Second Assistant Postmaster General, stated that, in his judgment as a builder, this building was the best workshop, from the standpoint of a building in which Federal workers worked, in this city.

Mr. BLANTON. It is one of the best constructed buildings in this entire city. Because it now shows some little age on the outside, it does not suit the fantastic taste of some of the people of Washington. They want every building within this city to look brand new. And they want as much money as possible spent annually in new construction. The very fact it has stood there for a few years and the very fact the stone has turned gray on the outside adds to its picturesqueness, and I hope the powers that be here in this Congress will see to it that this beautiful, substantial, valuable building of this Government is not allowed to be torn down.

This is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this project has been before every Congress, probably, since the establishment of the seat of government here in Washington. I myself have had a vital interest in it. I was disgusted when I first visited Washington at the appearance of this approach to the Capitol, and although I had no idea at the time I might some time attain a seat in this honorable body, I thought if I ever had any influence in this body I would ask if they would not take steps toward taking these dumps, these Chinese joints, these unmentionable places, out from under the eyes of people who visit this otherwise wonderfully beautiful capital city of ours. I have introduced a bill and sought such legislation in every session since I have been a Member of Congress.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman does not regard the Southern Railway Building as a structure of that sort?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am coming to that. I do not believe there is the least cause for fear or apprehension on the part of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman will admit that authority is conferred in this amendment to do that if the Secretary of the Treasury sees fit to do it and can get the approval of the Public Buildings Commission.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I doubt if the present Secretary of the Treasury would recommend it, and I am positive the Public Buildings Commission would not indorse or approve such a recommendation. Last year you passed a bill which exempted the Southern Railway Building from the taking. I thought it a grave error, and I am mighty glad it did not go through in that form. This year the committee has seen fit to include the Southern Railway Building.

I believe the gentleman will be as old as I am, and perhaps as gray as I am, before he ever sees the Southern Railway Building demolished or the present Post Office headquarters demolished. There is plenty of work for this commission to do in cleaning up this area in the first place and then in building such buildings thereon as the Government needs for the transaction of its business. I very much fear if we delay this matter further perhaps some of us who are very anxious to see this wonderful improvement before we may reach the end of our days may not have that privilege.

I do not believe there is the least ground for fear on the part of any Member of this House, and I would cooperate with my friend, and have cooperated with him in the past, in trying to protect the Government in such matters.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Why not except it from the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Because personally I have so much confidence in the members of the Public Buildings Commission and in their intelligence and their integrity that I would much rather leave it just as it is than jeopardize the chances of the passage of the bill or delay it by attempting to add other amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is undue alarm about the amendment which has been placed in this bill by the Senate. What is the situation? It is agreed by the House of Representatives and by the Senate, legislatively, that the Government shall purchase the so-called triangle property for the building of the necessary departmental structures. It is a necessary incident of that construction that authority be given to raze the buildings on the land to be occupied by the buildings we are to erect.

I am reminded of a joke, which is familiar to all of you, about the aldermen who proposed to build a new town hall, and their resolutions were to this effect: "Resolved, first, that we build a new town hall; resolved, secondly, that we build the new town hall on the site and out of the material of the old town hall; and resolved, thirdly, that we do not tear down the old town hall until the new town hall is completed." [Laughter and applause.]

Some of these buildings in the triangle must be torn down and some of them should be torn down. There seems to be quite a bit of solicitude, and perhaps properly, on the part of my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK] in regard to the Southern Railway Building.

I want to call attention to this fact. It is going to be absolutely necessary for the Government to have suitable quarters in which to house certain employees of the Government during the construction of the departmental buildings to which finally they will be assigned, and the Public Buildings Commission is going to be hard put to it to find such quarters. The Southern Railway Building affords an admirable solution for much of that problem.

What is the Public Buildings Commission? It is composed of two Members of the Senate, two Members of the House of Representatives, the Architect of the Capitol, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Parks. I think I can give the House reasonable assurance that, despite the editorials to which my colleague has referred, there is no disposition on the part of the Public Buildings Commission to raze the Southern Railway Building at any time in the near future at least.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. My colleague understands that this program is expected to extend over a number of years.

Mr. LANHAM. That is true.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It may be 10 years from now, but we are passing the legislation for it.

Mr. LANHAM. Necessarily the Government has to function through men, and when obligations and responsibilities are placed upon men under their oaths to act in accordance with their best judgment and the best interests of the country, and when the approval of the Public Buildings Commission must be had for the razing of that building I do not think that in advance we should impute to these men motives of the vandals and to suppose that they will ruthlessly and recklessly destroy our property. The members of the Public Buildings Commission naturally are more immediately and more vitally concerned in this matter than the Members of the House who are not serving on that commission, because they have the important function of assigning space for all departments of the Government here and for finding quarters for the proper temporary accommodation of employees during the process of building.

Personally, I think the Southern Railway Building is an attractive structure. Certainly it would be well adapted to use for temporary quarters, and I think with some modification it might be used permanently and fit in with the general plan for the triangle.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Is it not the gentleman's view that if we had three buildings of this character at the disposal of the Public Buildings Commission at this time, we could use them all?

Mr. LANHAM. Indeed, we could; and during the construction of the contemplated buildings it would be foolhardy, in my judgment, to raze a structure like the Southern Railway Building, so well adapted for the housing of employees, and then go out and rent other quarters for that purpose.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I hope my colleague does not think that I am foolish enough to think it will be immediately done. My objection is that we are authorizing it to be done and already certain newspapers in Washington are advocating that it ultimately be done.

Mr. LANHAM. It may be that some are advocating it and it may be that ultimately it will be a wise thing to do, but with the lights before us there is no prospect that it is going to be done at any time in the near future. As I have said, I hope that it may be modified in such a way that it may fit in with the permanent plan.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand this amendment, no authority is granted under it for the destruction of the Post-Office Building, is there?

Mr. LANHAM. None whatever. It applies only to the area to be acquired in the triangle which the Government does not now own.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman's argument does not apply to the Post-Office Building at all?

Mr. LANHAM. No; not in the least. There would be no authority to demolish the Post-Office Building under this amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And, as a matter of fact, the so-called Fine Arts Commission has nothing to do with it.

Mr. LANHAM. The Fine Arts Commission has no authority in this matter at all. It has simply been acting cooperatively in the way of suggestion when requested to do so by the Public Buildings Commission. The authority is with the Public Buildings Commission. The approval of that commission must be had, and not that of the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BUSBY. As a matter of fact, the act of May 25, 1926, known as the Elliott bill, gives the Secretary of the Treasury plenty of power to tear down the Post-Office Building when he gets ready, does it not?

Mr. LANHAM. I hesitate to answer the gentleman's question because I have not a copy of that act before me and I do not remember its verbiage. I would not undertake to construe that law from memory, but certainly there is no authority of that kind given in the amendment which is now before us.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 282, nays 62, not voting 87, as follows:

THE ARMY BAND

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, on February 17, 1925, I expressed the hope to the Sixty-eighth Congress that the time would come when the people of this country should one day have an opportunity periodically to hear the splendid representative musical organizations of our Military Establishment.

I am very happy to-day, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, to say that the eve of the consummation of that wish is at hand. The United States Marine and Navy Bands have returned from successful tours which they have been making annually for some years.

On January 16 the United States Army Band will embark on its first public concert tour. Its itinerary includes a flying 42-day round of as many cities in 13 States. Thousands of persons over a wide area are soon to see and hear personally this fine group of musicians, whose efforts for the past few years have been such an inspiration to official Washington and the residents of the National Capital.

In authorizing the tour the War Department has recognized not only the band's high musical and military standing to-day, but its manifold power for encouraging the youth of our Nation in musical effort and in instilling an appreciation of and love for good music among its auditors everywhere.

What a boon, also, it will be to the patriotism of those who have often read of the United States Army Band, in its distinctive "cadet gray," in connection with national events of contemporary historical significance, but to whom this great organization has remained but a name! What a thrill will come to every true American as he hears from the same band the very strains which have fallen upon the ears of Presidents and potentates of world renown—strains which were heard by such home-coming national heroes as our own Lindbergh!

I have recounted here before the origin of the United States Army Band, how it was organized in 1922 by General Pershing, then Chief of Staff, to do for the peace-time morale of the Army and citizenry what his famous A. E. F. band, of which this organization is the outgrowth, did for the fighting heart of the troops. It was General Pershing's desire that the Army should have a representative musical organization second to none in the world. I believe it may be said with all conservatism that this wish is now fulfilled.

A brief résumé of some of the more important of the band's activities will serve to demonstrate the confidence imposed in it by the highest figures in public life.

It was the United States Army Band which President Coolidge chose last year to begin what he hopes will become a custom of an annual Thanksgiving concert at the White House. Again, the band was designated to play the national anthem of Mexico while the representative band of that country played the Star-Spangled Banner during the recent inauguration of direct telephonic communication between the capitals of the two nations. The Presidents and their respective staffs "listened in" through telephone headpieces while this solemn and impressive ceremony took place.

The United States Army Band has bent every effort to bring pleasure to citizens of all classes and locations through the relatively new medium of the radio. As a result, during the past year it has broadcast farther, more frequently, and to more millions than any other military musical organization. It holds the record for organizations of its kind in the matter of number of radio stations "tied up" in a broadcasting event, the occasion being 52-station hook-up for the home-coming celebration for Col. Charles A. Lindbergh. The United States Army Band was seated directly in front of the stand on the Monument Lot, here in Washington, when President Coolidge decorated the young air hero, and it furnished the music incident to that epoch-making occasion.

The United States Army Band is a regular feature of the Radio Corporation of America's famed "blue network," which carries the best in radio audition into countless thousands of homes over a gigantic network of stations.

Radio demands for this organization were so great that, in addition to its many official duties, it frequently broadcast as often as two or three times a day.

The concerts played by this band from the east steps of the Capitol as a part of its summer series here in Washington also were broadcast to thousands in addition to those fortunate enough to be able to attend.

So established, in fact, has the United States Army Band become as a radio institution that its studio in the Army Music School at Washington Barracks has been fitted up as a sub-broadcasting station, details of its design having been worked out by radio engineers to give the best possible broadcasting effect. The room is virtually unique, of its kind.

The band has been unusually active in promoting good feeling between this country and our Pan-American neighbors. As the organization officially delegated by the Pan American Union to introduce South American music into this country, it has played hundreds of concerts, many of which were broadcast. A feature of every program on the band's forthcoming tour will be two or more of the colorful numbers of the Latin-American people, thus extending this admirable work of mutual understanding to the people of this Nation in the universal language—music.

Some of the band's duties have been of a sadder nature, but reflect, nevertheless, the respect in which it is held by authorities desiring to pay the last full measure of honor, musically, to a stricken personage. It headed the funeral procession of the late Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood; it performed a similar function upon the death of President Harding.

It led the Coolidge inaugural parade; it has been the official band on many occasions for the reception of visiting foreign dignitaries. World-series throngs have enthused to its music.

In short, the United States Army Band has attempted to be the military musical organization for all classes. It is a band the public is proud to have represent it on the most formal occasions; it is a band the public loves to hear and which the public understands.

The band's outstanding record connotes musical superiority. With the pick of all the Army establishment's "line bands" in its personnel and the sterling output of the Army Music School to draw upon, it has achieved this in the opinion not only of lay auditors but music critics.

It is not only capable of the stirring marches so closely identified with military bands but of the finest musically. Its programs include the best symphonic works, and its ability to impart a symphonic quality to such numbers has won highest praise.

Under the leadership of Second Leader Thomas F. Darcy a symphonette has been organized among men in the band doubling on orchestral instruments. This unit also is a radio favorite and has been heard as well on many state and public occasions. There is a dance orchestra, likewise recruited from the band's personnel, which supplies music for frolics of the near-by Army posts.

With such a splendid history, it is almost unnecessary to add that the band has had sterling leadership.

First recognition should go to Capt. Curtis D. Alway, whose intelligent and sympathetic understanding of the band's problems and zealous and enthusiastic efforts in behalf of its advancement, has combined with his soldierly discipline of the organization to give it the widest scope for dignified achievement.

Musically, however, the band's meteorical attainments must be acknowledged in large measure to the thorough scholarship of its leader, William J. Stannard, and his untiring efforts—he works day and night—for its advancement. A summary of his musical education has been placed upon the official record before, so it is only pertinent here to recall with pride that he was, in the main, Army trained, coming to his post as the first and only leader of the United States Army Band after 18 years progress through the various stages of the ranks, and recognized as the outstanding musician in the Army and one of the best band conductors in the world.

He has been ably abetted by Second Leader Darcy, also an Army product, and a musician and trumpet soloist of highest rank.

In the end, however, it is the musicians in the separate chairs who shape the destiny of any musical organization, and so it is a matter of pride that I place in the RECORD the names of the individual members, whose excellent musicianship and close cooperation with the leaders, has made the United States Army Band the outstanding organization it is to-day:

MINERS' STRIKE IN PENNSYLVANIA

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] desire recognition?

Mr. BERGER. Yes. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to speak out of order for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have received the following telegram this morning:

BROWNSVILLE, PA., January 7, 1928.

Congressman VICTOR BERGER,
Washington, D. C.:

The Vesta Coal Co. has a gang of gunmen evicting the coal miners from their houses at its No. 6 mine. These women and children have no shelter. I appealed to General Manager Joe Edwards to stay evictions until Monday, when we would have barracks sufficiently erected to shelter these people. I asked in the name of humanity not to put these women and children on the roadside these cold nights and Sunday. He answered, "To hell with humanity." He hoped they would freeze and rot. These people have been in the employ of that company for more than 10 years.

LAWRENCE DWYER,
Representative United Mine Workers of America,
West Brownsville, Pa.

There is a strike on in the Pennsylvania coal mines. Here is another piece of news in connection with this strike.

Judge J. N. Langham, president judge of the court of common pleas of Indiana County, Pa., on November 8 issued an injunction, in which he addressed the whole army of strikers by name, "District No. 2, United Mine Workers of America, their associates, aiders, abettors, and agents, or any other person acting with the above named," and instructed them as follows:

We therefore * * * do strictly enjoin and command you, the said defendants, your associates, aiders, abettors, and agents, and all other persons, that you from henceforth desist * * *.

(d) From distributing pecuniary contributions, in furtherance of the conspiracy to keep men from employment or seeking employment with the plaintiff.

The plaintiff is the Clearfield Bituminious Coal Corporation, which operates the mines at Rossiter.

Fred Thomas, organizer of district No. 2, said:

The purpose of that injunction is to starve our men into submission. They have nothing but the pitiful $3 a week the union gives them. And now the court bars that. We are forbidden to share what little we have with our own people. And they need it so!

The need in Rossiter is terrible. It is also terrible in the coal fields of western and central Pennsylvania, among the 85,000 strikers and their 200,000 dependents.

A typical instance—and not an exaggerated one—was reported in the New York Daily News.

A reporter arrived at one of these homes at noon. He was ushered into the kitchen of Mrs. Francis Summers, young mother of old American stock, as are most of the Rossiter strikers. Three children clustered about the table.

They were hungry. All the mother had for them were three soda crackers for that meal. These crackers she soaked in a plate of weak tea.

The meal of each child consisted of one soaked cracker, fed to it with a spoon.

This is what the children got. The mother got nothing.

That is the situation in Rossiter. And it is there that it is made a crime to give children food.

In the face of these privations and hardships it is remarkable that the spirit of the strikers and their families has not been subdued by all the injunctions and all the evictions and all the hardships to which they have been exposed by the mine owners and the judges who do their bidding.

Not only are the strikers and their families prevented, under the terms of the injunction, from receiving the little aid they would otherwise get but they are even prevented "from congregating on the Magyar Presbyterian Church lot, or any other lot, lots, place or places at the time the employees of the plaintiff enter the mine or at the time the employees of the plaintiff come out of the mine."

This provision in the injunction was included because of the company's statement that the striking miners hold meetings at the church in the morning and evening and sing songs as the strike breakers enter and leave the mine, which is near the church.

Many of the songs thus sung are composed of inflammatory words set to hymn tunes—the company complained—

the tendency and purpose of which are to incite the passions of the named defendants * * * and arouse said defendants * * * to a hostile and threatening attitude toward the plaintiff.

The Rev. A. J. Phillips, the regularly ordained minister of the congregation, denied anything except hymns had been sung at his church, among which he listed the following:

"Nearer, My God to Thee," "I'm on the Winning Side," "I Can Not Be Idle," "Blessed Assurance," "How Firm a Foundation," "When We All Get to Heaven," "I've Enlisted in the Service," "Where He Leads Me I Will Follow," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "Stand Up for Jesus," and "I Love to Tell the Story."

But singing these hymns bothered the company. And the strikers were ordered to desist.

And, it is reported, there is a burly deputy permanently posted in a special guard shack just outside the church to see that the injunction is observed.

Rossiter is not the average coal town in that there are some parts of the town not owned by the company, whereas in other mining towns everything in it and on it is owned by the mine owners. But despite the "free" territory still to be found there, the strikers are not permitted to visit one another or even to walk together under the injunction.

It was on that kind of a situation that the new year dawned for thousands of families. And it continues to grow worse.

And on the dawn of the new year a court order compelling 800 families to vacate company-owned houses of the Vesta Coal Co., whose striking employees sent me the telegram I read at the beginning of my remarks, was issued. That company, I am advised, is a subsidiary of the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, and is related somewhat to the Mellon interests.

Now, gentlemen, a strike nowadays is recognized everywhere as the legal economic weapon of the working class. A strike is considered a conspiracy in only two countries, in Russia and in Italy. And it seems a strike is also a conspiracy in Mellon's State, in Pennsylvania.

Russia, Italy, and Pennsylvania—a great combination indeed—but I think it is a disgraceful combination.

According to the newspaper clipping that I got this morning there are 83,000 miners on strike. There are 200,000 dependents. The United Mine Workers of America have so far erected barracks containing about 1,500 rooms for the evicted strikers and their families.

I want to bring this to the attention of the House, because I expect to introduce a resolution to-morrow asking for an investigation of the strike in Pennsylvania.

I yield back the rest of my time, Mr. Speaker.

APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8269), making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8269, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8269, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SEARS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SEARS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the American people are about to make the most solemn choice with reference to internal improvements that they have ever been called upon to make—one that will affect the country either beneficially or banefully more than any other it has made. It is of the utmost importance that the decision shall be made wisely and well.

In its briefest statement, the question relates to the disposal of water.

Now, water being one of the great forces of nature, is either of wonderful benefit when under control or it is of destruction to life and property to the extent of lack of control.

This question is now at the front because of the great flood conditions that existed last year in the lower Mississippi and its tributaries. Some hundreds of lives were lost and probably $500,000,000 worth of property destroyed. Many thousands of our citizens were left homeless and their prospect in life, financially speaking, swept away. The greater flooded area was because waters from different watersheds and flood areas were allowed to concentrate at the lower central part beyond capacity of safe conduit to the Gulf.

Two lines or schools of thought present plans for the control of these flood waters. The first is—and it is advocated by our Government educated and employed engineering department—that we shall add to our levees and revet them; that we shall construct a number of spillways, like parallel new rivers, and so invite the expected great floods of the future to continue, and through our new rivers and our higher revetted levees give conduit to the Gulf.

The second meditates that there shall be no gathering of flood waters of great devastating force beyond safe control whatever. Let us shortly consider these two plans.

As to the first: For 50 years our national reliance has been on levees. We have leaned on broken reeds. We have given all the money that the Army engineers asked for. We have bled the people of the southland for contributing moneys in the areas affected beyond their ability to pay more. And the net result has been nothing. Worse than nothing. Levees are either a perfect protection or they are a trap—inviting the feeling of safety and where giving away causing death and destruction. The new plan by the Army engineers carried to safe conclusions and stripped of their hidden intendments means billions of money, and in times of floods that may be expected, failing and causing immense disaster.

It means the withdrawal of many millions of acres of land that should be of the utmost production and their devotion to unproductiveness, to river beds, and to become places where human productive energy can not exist. It will mean the annual upkeep charge of millions of dollars without one cent of productive income. It means the removal of many thousands of people from their homes and scattering them away from the places of their rearage. It means years of litigation, therefore slow construction, before titles and damages are settled, which will mean most tedious delay. This plan will meet most general opposition, it is believed, except by those of the city of New Orleans. This plan adds nothing to the navigable waters of the Mississippi. It will add a most horrible assault upon a large and what should be prosperous people, and such as our history to this time does not record.

As opposed to this tendered and vicious unwholesome legislation there is presented the dam and reservoir system, which, in short, means the taking possession of the flood waters in ample quantity and in such places as will prove practical by placing them in dams and reservoirs during high-water periods, utilizing the water, and returning the impounded water to the streams by spillways at low-water periods; and by putting them in the semiarid soils of the West, where the flood waters largely originate, from which use they will return again to the streams after benefiting mankind. Next to the soil and sunshine themselves, these waters so sought to be turned loose forever as a useless thing are, in fact, the greatest remaining asset of the American people, and whoever would intentionally and ruthlessly settle a policy on this country of wastage is a public enemy.

No part of this country can prosper without navigation. The impounding and the using of waters and the returning of them to the watercourses at low-water months means stabilization of the flowage of the rivers, the settling of questions of navigable waters; it means that erosion of soils will cease. It will mean the greater capacity of rivers to carry off waters by reason of the constant intake of siltage ceasing, giving a greater capacity in the carrying off of waters. This system will mean an hitherto unknown fertility to the Great Plains country east of the Rocky Mountains, 240,000,000 acres of which are now called semiarid. This is the great wheat country. But by reason of being wheated year after year it is losing its fertility and lacks moisture whereby nitrogen can be placed back in the ground. It is only by summer fallowing that wheat growing is in any degree a success. This section is crossed by rivers whose flood waters very largely cause the floods in the lower Mississippi. These flood waters are the last great national resource of this great Nation remaining yet to be conserved or thrown away. If nothing is done to conserve the waters that are known to this strip, and make use of them for the public welfare, in about 10 years consumption of wheat in this country will pass production and we will be on an import basis.

There is no question but that the waters of the Arkansas River and its tributaries can be absolutely controlled by reservoirs and dams and the water placed to great income use that will reimburse the Government for its outlay of conservation,

There is no question but that the waters of the Missouri and its tributaries can be, practically in their entirety, impounded and conserved, and it is believed entirely reimburse the Government for the outlay and expense of conservation. With these waters impounded and made use of for soil fertility, this strip of ground east of the Rocky Mountains will become the most fertile region of our country.

Shall we administer to the welfare of this country or to its undoing? Shall we dedicate millions of acres of our richest land to river beds and backwater areas and permanent storage basins or allow them to be peopled with a prosperous citizenship, so adding to their comfort and the welfare of the Nation? Shall we dedicate the great semiarid country to a constantly down grade of agriculture, of croppage, and of citizenship, or shall we perform a great national service by conserving the waters that are known to it, bringing back a greater prosperity than it has ever enjoyed?

This last year for want of water conservation floods devastated to the extent of half a billion dollars. The summer before the great district that has been referred to east of the Rocky Mountains was drought stricken to the extent of at least a billion and a half of dollars, and for lack of waters that were ready at hand and that add to the great flood burdens below. It would thus seem that by reservoir control the great floods may be done away with, the great droughts may be controlled and done away with, and our navigable waters be benefited without the crest of floods and without a low-water season. These questions all go hand in hand. There is no practical and comprehensive plan of flood control based on any other hypothesis than that of taking possession of the waters and harnessing them and setting them to work, so that the people of the lower Mississippi shall be without fear of the flood season, and so that the others of the great valley shall no longer live fearful of the drought.

What is the difference between the cost of construction of the two several plans?

The Mississippi River Commission plan meditates an outlay of about $450,000,000, as stated, but really means many millions more, as there is not taken into account the raising of many hundred miles of improved highways; nor of very many miles of railroads; nor of telegraph lines and telephone systems; nor of the cost of the fee or the use of the lands. The cost is believed to be well over a billion dollars. And no income is anticipated after completion; only added expense of upkeep. And then without any idea of aiding the Arkansas, Red, Missouri, and other tributaries in their battle against the floods—only New Orleans.

The plan of dam and reservoir system of control meditates perfect protection to all the people of all the streams, that when the small floods are under control there will be no great floods anywhere.

No engineer will say that it is impractical to take possession of the damaging flood waters. If 500,000 cubic feet per second are withheld from the Missouri and Ohio, and 1,200,000 cubic feet per second are withheld from the Arkansas and the White, there is then ample capacity in the lower Mississippi for all of the flood waters that will come in flood years like the present or are likely to come in future years, and all of the dams and reservoirs will have an income-producing value. If desirable, even more water may be impounded on the Tennessee and the Ohio. Three hundred and fifty millions of dollars is probably more than is necessary for all the impounding required to bring about the desired result on the Missouri, the Arkansas, and the White.

The semiarid soils of the western plains will be found a great storage basin, every acre of which will take up from 1 to 3 feet of water and at a profit on the sale to the Government. As for the first plan, all is outlay and no income. The first means distress to many people. The second means prosperity to all, including the entire Nation.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, this finishes the debate on our side of the House, and I would like to have the gentleman from Alabama use his time.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in a discussion a few days ago on the question of farm relief the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS] reached the conclusion that the sine qua non in farm relief was an equalization fee. Being principally, and I might say wholly, engaged in agriculture myself, outside of my membership in this House, I am deeply interested in agricultural relief and advancement, and I want to discuss just for a minute that requisite which seems to be laid down for any agricultural relief from the standpoint of the cotton raisers of this country.

I appreciate the attitude of the people who raise wheat. The McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee in it temporarily, at least, would have been a benefit to them, but I want to show what it would have done to the cotton people.

We raised 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1926. We consumed 800,000,000 of it at home and about 200,000,000 bushels were exported. Those are the round figures. There is a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, and it is natural to suppose that if we could control that surplus so as to make the domestic market a purely domestic market and prevent wheat from being shipped in to compete, that naturally it would have raised the price of wheat about 40 cents a bushel before it could have been interfered with by outside wheat. Well, let us look at what would have been the result and you can see why I do not blame the wheat people for standing for it. If I were a wheat man, I would have been standing for it.

If you raise the price of your 800,000,000 bushels 40 cents a bushel, you have put a profit of $320,000,000 in the pockets of the wheat farmers. If you export your 200,000,000 bushels and sell them at a loss of 40 cents a bushel and make it up by the equalization fee, you have only lost $80,000,000. If you take that from your $320,000,000, you have a net profit to the wheat people of $240,000,000. Therefore, I say I am in sympathy with the wheat people, and I do not blame them for wanting that arrangement. But let us see the picture of the cotton folks. We made 18,000,000 bales of cotton. The most optomistic prognostication that was made in the whole debate was that if we got that into operation it would raise the price of domestically sold cotton $20 a bale, or 4 cents a pound. Well, let us look at it a minute from that standpoint. We consumed 8,000,000 bales in this country; raise that $20 a bale and it would increase the price $160,000,000. Well, they made that, of course, but we exported and will export 10,000,000 bales. That has got to be sold at a loss of $20 a bale and made up by the equalization fee. That would mean a loss of $200,000,000, and we made $160,000,000, so you will see that the cotton people are $40,000,000 out, and we are faced with an equalization fee of $10 or $11 a bale to make that up.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. How does the gentleman arrive at the loss of $20 a bale?

Mr. STEVENSON. If it is being sold at a loss of $20 a bale on the world market, and you sold 10,000,000 bales on the world market, and you have lost $200,000,000; and the 4 cents a pound which they claim would have just brought it up to a living price would mean $20 a bale, and we would be forced to sell the 10,000,000 bales at a loss, and we would make it up by an equalization fee.

There is what confronted the cotton farmer. If you, under that proposition, export more than you consume in your domestice market, you are going to lose more than you make. Suppose it was $25 a bale. This would just accentuate it and be that much more.

Then there is another thing about it. Of the $240,000,000 profit to the wheat farmer at least 25 per cent of it would be unloaded on the cotton farmer, because he has to buy and does buy 25 per cent of the wheat sold in this country, and that would be $60,000,000 more. So that under that scheme the cotton farmer is confronted with at least a loss of $100,000,000 a year and would be that much worse off than he is now.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. As I understand, the gentleman makes the point that if our exports are greater than our home consumption we would lose?

Mr. STEVENSON. We would lose; yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. But it is not the fact that last year is the only year in which our exports exceeded our home consumption?

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, no. We have exported more cotton 9 years out of 10 ever since the Civil War than we have used at home.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. KERR. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion. Why does the gentleman assume we are going to sell this cotton in the foreign market at a loss?

Mr. STEVENSON. We have to sell it somewhere and we can not sell it here because we have saturated the domestic market and we will have to sell it in the markets abroad, and when we sell it abroad we sell at the world price irrespective of the equalization fee or anything else we put on it here.

This is why I say it looks to me as if you are figuring the cotton farmer into the same position as the boy that you have all heard about when the schoolmaster told him to figure out how long it would take a frog to get out of a well if it was 30 feet deep and he climbed 10 feet every day and went back 20 feet every night.

After figuring from Friday until Monday, the boy came in and the teacher asked him, "Did you get the frog out," and he said "No"; that he had run out of paper, and added, "If I had had another pad, I would have had him in Hades by this time." This is where you are going to put the farmer with this equalization fee.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Would the gentleman, as a cotton farmer, have any objection to taking cotton out of the McNary-Haugen bill and letting the wheat farmers have it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I certainly would not.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Would the gentleman vote for the bill under those circumstances?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not prepared to say I would vote for such a bill, because the gentleman will see where the cotton farmer comes in if we let him by a scheme of that kind put up the price of wheat on us. It is hitting us anyway, but I have very much sympathy with the proposition if they will take the equalization fee out of it, or leave cotton out of the operations of the equalization fee.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I mean leave cotton out of the bill entirely.

Mr. STEVENSON. Of course, I would not be affected in that instance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, I am principally and totally engaged in cotton farming. The equalization fee last year would have cost me $1,100 of the profit in my cotton crop, and cotton went up from 12 cents to 22 cents. Mine was sold at an average of 21¾. The price went up that much. If the McNary-Haugen bill had passed last year with the equalization fee in it, I suppose everybody would have said that was what put up the price; but as a matter of fact, it was a question of supply and demand.

The gentleman from North Carolina asked me why I said we would sell in the foreign market. We would have to do one of two things—either sell it or hold it. Suppose we had held 6,000,000 bales out of the crop of 1926 and had had it as a shadow over the market. When it developed there was going to be less than a normal crop in 1927 and cotton began to pop up, and they had put this 6,000,000 bales on the market, where would we have been? The farmer who made the crop of 1927 and who owned it would have been smashed under the load of cotton which the speculator would have thrown on the markets of this country.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman tell us approximately the difference between the price of American cotton sold in this country and that which was sold abroad?

Mr. STEVENSON. There is no difference at all, because the world price fixes it, and the difference is the difference in transportation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, the measure we have under discussion to-day contains an appropriation for an industrial survey of the Southwest. Of course, this includes the State of Oklahoma, and it being the particularly bright star of that great group of States I desire to thank the Appropriation Committee and the Department of Commerce for the consideration given, and I am quite sure that this survey will be of great benefit not only to the Southwest but to the entire country.

In the recent past I have been asked many questions regarding the State of Oklahoma. At a later date it is my purpose to discuss the greatness of this grand new State and to present some statistics and facts that will be amazing and interesting to those not acquainted with the potential wealth and possibilities of the State, and which may point the way and possibilities for the sons and daughters of older and crowded communities to find prosperity and happiness in the golden Southwest, and, in passing, may I not point with pride to the fact that this survey will bring out that last year the combined agricultural and mineral production of Oklahoma was greater than that of any other State of the Union. We hope and we know that this item will be retained in this measure. We are thankful for it and are sure that it will be very beneficial. Also I note that this bill contains appropriations covering our Foreign Service, and we have heard it ably discussed here to-day. We are all, I think, proud of our Foreign Service and ready at all times to support it with the resources of our Nation. But I note, Mr. Chairman, that recently we have been represented in foreign countries by two great emissaries who have done much to bring peace and good will to the nations of the earth, wherever they have gone. Of course, I refer to Colonel Lindbergh and Col. Will Rogers. They need no commendation at my hands. But of Colonel Rogers I want to speak for a moment. He is Oklahoma's greatest citizen, coming from the district I have the honor to represent. Justly we point with pride to him. He is a native son, born of the great tribe of Cherokee Indians within the State, educated in her schools, and blessed with the luck of coming from a State whose environments are progressive and American. Humorist? Yes. But a humorist whose every joke smacks of a foundation that is solid and sound. He is a student of government. This is evidenced by every word he utters touching upon Government or national affairs. Illustrating this, I note that on January 2, in commenting, he said:

> Did you read all the New Year's optimism and apple sauce in the papers to-day by all our leading men and bankers? Same gang every year. Everyone either a millionaire or an officeholder. Now there are 30,000 millionaires in the country and 110,000,000 that are not; yet, you never see a New Year's prediction by one of the hundred and ten. Looks like just for the novelty one paper would print just what some poor man saw in store for the coming year.

This gentleman, Mr. Chairman, has proven himself to be a humorist, a humanitarian, a philosopher, an executive, and a statesman combined, and now that I have observed our Republican friends halting between choosing Hoover, Dawes, or Lowden, and not at this time disposed to take our own beloved NICK LONGWORTH, and also note my own Democratic Party hesitating between the great Governors of New York and Ohio, Al Smith and Vic Donahey, and the great statesman from Missouri, Senator JAMES A. REED, I hope I may be pardoned if to the other 110,000,000 referred to by Mr. Rogers I propose that Col. Will Rogers, the humorist, the philosopher, and statesman, is a man able, capable, and fitted to administer the great office of President of the United States to the benefit and satisfaction of all, and that they see to it that he is nominated and elected to that office.

Mr. MANLOVE. Would the gentleman from Oklahoma like for a second to the nomination to come from this side of the House or from his side?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Well, I think from both sides.

However, Mr. Chairman, I rose to discuss flood control. There will not come before this Congress a more important matter than that of flood control. Naturally, as this is a new subject, at least the recent disastrous floods convincing all of us that the question has taken on a new phase, there is necessarily a great difference of opinion as to just what should be done. Each Member who has observed the people of his State or district suffering unmeasurably by reason of these floods expects, and has a right to expect, that if flood control is made a national matter in one part of the United States, that it should and must be made a governmental responsibility in any part of the United States where people suffer from a like cause. The contention of the people living on the tributaries of the Mississippi River that they are entitled to national relief is just as plausible as that of those living on the Mississippi itself. In our opinion, floods can not be controlled on the Mississippi until they are controlled on these tributaries. Any plan of flood control on the Mississippi without taking into consideration the necessities and rights of the people on these tributaries would be patchwork at the best.

In fact, it would be but following the policy of the Government for the last 50 years on the Mississippi, which the floods of 1927 demonstrated to be a colossal failure. To make an appropriation for flood control only on the Mississippi at this time, ignoring the tributaries, would be, in my opinion, parallel to a man starting to build a house by attempting to construct the roof first. It might also be compared with the impossibility of drilling an oil well by starting at the bottom, and would be as great a mistake as to suggest that in opening up a mine you start back in the mountain where the ore lies and dig toward the surface. Would it not also involve duplicate work? That is, are there not things that can be done on the tributaries, if all the tributaries as well as the Mississippi are to be taken into one general plan, that would make it unnecessary to do some things suggested to be done with a plan of action at this time upon the Mississippi alone. Why not make of this question a comprehensive one? There is no denying but what in the interests of the United States as a whole that these tributaries must be taken care of. No man would undertake to erect a great building until he had his plans and specifications made for every part of that building from the foundation to the roof. Why should the Government transact its business in any other manner than along the lines of successful business?

I think that the engineers, including those representing the Government, will admit that the Mississippi River floods are never caused by Mississippi water alone, but that the destruction of lives and property commences only after these tributaries have discharged their great volumes of water into the main stem. Why try to control this alone by work on the Mississippi when it has already been proven that it can not be done? I venture the assertion that if the recommendations of the President and the Army Engineers are carried out at this time and the work limited only to the Mississippi, as they suggest that in the end, after we have done what must be done, controlled the tributaries as well as the Mississippi, that we will find that we have wasted millions upon this project.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. MANLOVE. The gentleman was president of a flood-relief association for seven States, and I suppose they have worked out some plans concerning the tributaries.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Oklahoma has a commission known as the conservation commission which has control of these matters within the State. The engineers of that commission have worked out a plan of reservoirs on the Arkansas River and its tributaries, and this plan has been indorsed by the association referred to by the gentleman from Missouri, which is known as the Arkansas River Flood Control Association, which embraces a membership from seven States, and of which Col. C. B. Douglas, of Tulsa, Okla., is president, and of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANLOVE] is vice president, representing his State. For the information of the gentleman I beg to inform him that Army engineers have admitted to me that this Oklahoma plan would control floods on the Arkansas River and its tributaries and make the Arkansas navigable for a considerable distance.

Mr. MANLOVE. Has the gentleman time now to make any explanation of what these reservoirs are and what the system will be?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I should like to do that, but I have not the time. However, I suggest to the gentleman that the Oklahoma plan referred to has been fully presented to the Committee on Flood Control of the House, and that no doubt the information desired by the gentleman will be found fully set out in the transcript of the proceedings of the committee.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have indicated a fear that unless deep study is given and that flood control is made general, including the tributaries as well as the Mississippi, that we may in the end discover we have wasted millions upon this project.

A rather startling statement in view of the high technical knowledge of the Chief of the Army Engineers and his associates. But, Mr. Chairman, I have discovered that Army engineers are not in agreement, for I note in the United States Daily that this paper—referring to the testimony of Colonel Potter, who has been an Army officer for 41 years—contained the following:

> At the night session, January 4, Colonel Potter told the committee that he did not concur in the flood plan of the commission, nor in any other report submitted to Congress.

He said that although he had signed the report of the commission he was sorely tempted to write a minority report, and had only been prevented from doing so because of his training as an Army officer for 41 years.

He said that—> neither General Jadwin nor the commission were well enough informed to write a comprehensive flood-control program at this time. The only feasible plan for flood control, according to the information in the possession of the commission, he said, was the Bonnet Carre spillway, and that no other method was justified until further study is made.

There is no greater medium through which the people and the Congress may gain information than through the newspapers of the Nation, and upon this subject especially the newspapers of the Mississippi Valley. I believe that it is the consensus of opinion of these newspapers that if the Government is to act on this in a broad, comprehensive, business-like manner that no steps for the expenditure of millions of the peoples' money will be taken in the matter of flood control until such time as a broad comprehensive system of controlling the tributaries as well as the Mississippi has been set up and adopted by the Congress. In my home city of Tulsa, Okla., is located one of the greatest newspapers of the Southwest, and may I say to my friends on the Republican side of this House that that newspaper is a Republican paper to the core. It is edited by Mr. Eugene Lorton, a gentleman who has fought Republican battles throughout the Nation and who has given much thought and study to Government economic propositions. Recently in an editorial commenting upon the President's message this editor said, in discussing that part of his message referring to flood control:

> But the President has made one recommendation in his message with which the people of the Central West will feel impelled to take sharp issue. In approaching the subject of flood control, one of the most important of national problems, now and for years to come, he has recommended that the present Congress confine itself to providing flood control for the lower Mississippi River, without consideration of the sensible plan of preventing floods in that area through controlling the waters before they reach the Mississippi.
> The suggestion lacks the usual Coolidge sound discernment. His plan is tantamount to attempting to repair an already partially shattered tank, into which several lines of hose are pouring powerful streams of water, instead of shutting off the water which is doing the damage.
> According to engineers who have made exhaustive surveys, 28 States pour a very considerable portion of their surface waters into the Mississippi, through tributaries. These flood waters not only cause unmeasured destruction in the lower Mississippi Valley but take tremendous toll in lives and property loss before quitting the States of their origin.
> Tulsa well remembers the flood of several years ago which inundated huge areas in this part of the State. That flood had taken toll all the way eastward from Colorado. Other parts of Oklahoma have suffered flood damage along tributaries of the Mississippi. And Oklahoma is but 1 of 28 affected States.
> The people of these States will be unable to indorse a proposal to rebuild and heighten the dikes along the lower Mississippi while the entire watershed of that river is permitted to pour its floods down, uncontrolled, into the inadequate outlet thus provided.
> Generally, the people in the middle section believe you must harness the tributaries before you can make the lower Mississippi behave itself.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have here a very interesting paper which was prepared by Mr. William A. Cox, of Nashville, Tenn., but who has been for many years connected with the Government service here in Washington,, on the Statue of Freedom, referring to the figure which surmounts the dome of the Capitol. He gives some very interesting history of the construction of the Capitol dome, and I think it is a proper subject for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I believe it will be of interest to Members and to the public.

I might say that this article is dedicated to the deceased wife of Mr. Cox.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following paper:

STATUE OF FREEDOM

(Dedicated to the memory of Lottie S. Cox)

True history is a chronology of the events and occurrences correctly and truthfully told. It has been the misfortune of all peoples when these records have been written while either passion or prejudice controlled the pen that irreparable injury has been committed when calumny or untruth has guided the hand when history has been written.

It is the object of this short sketch to narrate the truth relating to the Statue of Freedom adorning the imperial dome of the Nation's Capitol. Volumes have been written about the Nation's Capitol and the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor presented to this country by the French people. Naught should be said to detract from either of these noble emblems as they typify the lofty aspirations of a great people.

But few indeed have reflected or paused to observe the colossal conception or execution of the Statue of Freedom that stands atop the Capitol Building of this ever-growing Republic. Admirably poised 300 feet from the ground on top of the Capitol dome of the most magnificent building dedicated to the legislative functions of government in the world, expressing in no uncertain way a people's hopes, a people's pride, and a Nation's aspirations and destiny—peaceful, calm, and determined.

This exquisite piece of art was modeled by Thomas Crawford in Rome, Italy, from plans adopted by United States Senator Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings in 1850.

Early in 1853 the President, Franklin Pierce, turned over the completion of the Capitol Building and the placing on top of its dome the Statue of Freedom that stands thereon to Jefferson Davis, his Secretary of War.

Because of the unfortunate occurrence of secession of the 11 Southern States from the Union and the four years conflict of civil war between the North and the South upon a principle each believed to be right, and the ill feeling and bitterness engendered by the civil conflict, due credit has not yet been accorded to the magnificient work performed by Jefferson Davis in the plans for the completion of this stately structure, surmounted by a true representation of a great people's conception of freedom typified by the Statue of Freedom.

This colossal image of Statue of Freedom was cast at the Clark Mill's Foundry near Bladensburg, Md., about 8 miles from the Capitol Building. The model was designed and cast by Mr. Thomas Crawford while in Rome, Italy, and was put together and constructed by an Italian workman to prevent its being taken apart except by himself, the Italian. But the facts are that, notwithstanding this difficulty, its successful taking apart and handling in parts as a model was due to the faithful service and genius of an intelligent negro in Washington named Philip Reed, a mulatto slave owned by Mr. Clark Mill, and that much credit is due him for his faithful and intelligent services rendered in modeling and casting America's superb Statue of Freedom, which kisses the first rays of the aurora of the rising sun as they appear upon the apex of the Capitol's wonderful dome.

In March, 1856, Mr. Crawford forwarded to Jefferson Davis, then Secretary of War in President Franklin Pierce's Cabinet, photographs from the model of the statue, but because of the severe criticism of the Secretary of War of the cap decorating the head of the statue he had it changed to a helmet with a crest composed of an eagle's head and an arrangement of feathers suggested by the custom of Indian tribes.

Crawford named the group "Armed Liberty" but its official title from its receipt at the Capitol has been the figure of Freedom.

Photographs of this modified model of the statue were accepted by Jefferson Davis, the Secretary of War for the United States. The statue as completed stands upon a tholos. The right hand rests upon a sword while the left hand holds an olive branch.

The drapery is held in place by a brooch with "U. S." on the face. The head is crowned as described above with a freely treated helmet inscribed with stars and crest and an eagle.

A full-sized plaster model, the original of this statue, occupies the central position in the National Museum in Washington.

History records no worthier tribute than this crowning glory of the Nation's Capitol at Washington. A bronze statue, the Goddess of Freedom, standing to-day on the dome of the Capitol, 19 feet 6 inches in height, weighing 14,985 pounds, crowning the dome of the Capitol of the Republic as a sentinel to point all future generations to the magnificent work of art illustrating the mission of this Government of a free people and their proud ideals.

She proudly guards the cradle in which was nurtured the first constitutional government born, based upon the inalienable rights of man, conceived and dedicated to the broad principles that all men are created equal and are all entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

May she ever guard, cherish, and protect these principles and may her children turn with benediction to her founders and protectors.

The statue was placed in position on December 2, 1863, at the time when the Nation was engaged in the heat of civil conflict, when passions and prejudices were at fever heat. At that time worth and grandeur could not be accorded the merits they deserved. "But time at last sets all things even," and when the passions and faults of a gigantic conflict can be judged as to their relative merits the honor which is due the name of Jefferson Davis for the conception and execution of this great work of inspiring art should be accorded.

This statue typifies the broad ground of freedom in its fullest sense and is not limited in bounds or space as liberty is, which often is applied as being synonymous with freedom.

This statue is the theme of the following poem:

THE GODDESS OF FREEDOM HOW LOFTY SHE

The Goddess of Freedom how lofty she
  Where the sun in splendor beams;
How bright the stars around her shine,
  How lovely the moonlight gleams.
O'er the Capitol dome she proudly stands,
  The colors 'neath her feet
Waving over the marble Halls,
  Where the national statesmen meet.

The goddess of night, with brilliant gems
  In silence crowns her head;
She's kissed by the sun's first crimson ray
  As he wakes from his starry bed.
He showers her with heaven's blue
  While on his wayward west,
And gives her last his snowy bars
  Ere stars come spangle her breast.

Upon her dawn's first glimmer falls
  From billows fringed with gray;
It dims the torch that Liberty holds,
  But opens wide the day.
Upon her eye's last glimmer falls
  From Sierra Nevada's crest,
As retreating day falls fast asleep
  On El Dorado's breast.

Clouds of red, white, and blue that pass
  Forever on their way,
Like hills sublime, like mountains rise
  And greet her day by day.
Where eagles soar in circles grand,
  'Neath God's blue canopy,
They wing her love in freedom's name
  O'er the land of liberty.

In triumph and in splendor she
  Adorns our State with peace;
Like the sun turns night to day, she bids
  All dark contentions cease.
Aloft, alone our goddess shines
  From God's infinite main
Forever gleaming peace and joy
  Where freedom's path is lain.

Aloft the Goddess of Freedom,
  Aloft and alone in the skies!
Through winter winds, through summer climes,
  Lights flash out from her eyes,
    A beacon bright,
    Through stormy night
  To all the world they loom—
Our love, our peace and freedom's joy,
  From off the Capitol's dome.

WILLIAM A. COX.

NASHVILLE, TENN., January 6, 1927.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. It seems to me that that is a document of such worth and of so much interest to the country generally that it might be well to have an arrangement made to publish a number of them for distribution by Members of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think it might very well be done.

Mr. MANLOVE. I know that in my district, especially the patriotic organizations, such as the Daughters of the Revolution, and others will be delighted to have copies of that document.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALLOWANCE FOR CLERK HIRE AT UNITED STATES CONSULATES

For allowance for clerk hire at consulates, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $1,645,000. Clerks, whenever hereafter appointed, shall, so far as practicable, be appointed under civil-service rules and regulations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last year, when we had this item under consideration, I offered an amendment providing that clerks at United States consulates should be American citizens. I would go one step further now because of the information that I have received during the last year. I would prevent a naturalized citizen from serving as a clerk in an American consulate in the country of his birth. Since the enactment of the immigration laws American consuls have had a great deal more to do than they had theretofore—certainly much more than they had during my time 20 years ago. They have contact with literally thousands of people every week. This contact, in many instances, from the very nature of things, is entirely with the clerks. We have had some very unhappy experiences, and the very first impression of an immigrant who is to come to the United States is with the American consul abroad, and nothing should occur from that first contact which may give the future citizen of this country a wrong impression in respect to it.

Different customs prevail in different countries, and what may be considered a legitimate gratuity in some foreign country is not permissible under our code of official ethics. We expect that public officials shall refrain from receiving any gratuity of any kind, and when you have a clerk whose view of these things does not entirely accord with our code, and he is placed in a position to come in contact with thousands of prospective immigrants, or at least has first contact with these prospective immigrants, in talking to them, and has it within his power to put one ahead of others, then we are encouraging the creation of a very dangerous situation.

I notice now that under the bill they must be appointed as far as practicable under civil-service rule. That is one step forward, anyway, but it seems to me that the Committee on Foreign Affairs that has jurisdiction over Consular Service matters, and the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge this bill, ought to take the matter under serious advisement between now and the next appropriation bill, and, if necessary, provide more money to be paid to these people.

The question of the study of languages is not one that should deter at all. Young men who go into a foreign country to serve in the Consular Service are expected to learn the language of the country to which they are accredited. When I served in the Consular Service 23 years ago I was expected to and I did take up a Slav language. While it was a little difficult at first, yet that difficulty can be overcome and the language learned. Surely we can expect a young man who seeks to make the Consular Service his life work to learn the language of the country to which he is accredited.

I think the State Department is in agreement with the views that I have here expressed. The trouble seems to be that there is not sufficient money to attract native Americans. In the case of naturalized Americans, they can well be sent to countries other than the country of their birth. Sooner or later we must come to it, and from what I hear of conditions at some of the ports where immigration is heavy I think the quicker we do this the better it will be for the service.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] there are 975 of these appointments, and $975 a year is the highest salary any one of them is paid. They are paid from that on down to $1. They are doing menial work. They are doing work that no American would do. In the first place, we could not employ Americans to go over there and do that sort of work. They are minor employees, and I am sure the gentleman, if he understands it, would not want to have the man who scrubs the floor and takes care of the furniture and the lawns to have his place taken by some native American, when that work can be done by a native who is thoroughly familiar with it, and who knows how to do it, and who is in no way interfering with the running of the establishment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, I do not believe that in the doing of the work of a porter it is necessary to employ a diplomat, but I do say that the man at the door, the man who has contact with the immigrant and who acts as interpreter, should be a citizen of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU FOR PUBLICATION OF CUSTOMS TARIFFS

To meet the share of the United States in the annual expense for the year ending March 31, 1929, of sustaining the international bureau at Brussels for the translation and publication of customs tariffs, pursuant to the convention proclaimed December 17, 1890, $1,400.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we pass over the item of the water boundary between the United States and Mexico until to-morrow.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If the chairman will yield me a moment I would like to say a word.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Would it not be well to ask unanimous consent, after the paragraph is read, to return to it in case we should have the amendment which the chairman and myself discussed relative to this agreement?

Mr. SHREVE. I think that would be well.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I suggest that the paragraph be read, and then I will ask unanimous consent to return to it and will state the reasons why.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; and in case the recommendation does not come through we need not go back to it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. SHREVE. That is entirely satisfactory. Let the Clerk resume his reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

WATER BOUNDARY, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

For expenses of meeting the obligations of the United States under the treaties of 1884, 1889, 1905, and 1906 between the United States and Mexico, including not to exceed $1,200 for rent of offices, and the expenses of maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled vehicles, installation, maintenance, and operation of gauging stations where necessary and their equipment, and so much of the amount herein appropriated as may be necessary for these purposes may be transferred by the Secretary of State to the United States Geological Survey for direct expenditure, $58,000.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do so for the purpose of asking unanimous consent of the House that this paragraph may be returned to before the bill is reported to the House. That, I understand, is agreeable to the chairman in charge of the bill [Mr. SHREVE] and also to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The reason for this is that there is an amendment that we hope to have perfected by that time for the survey of the Rio Grande from El Paso to Fort Quitman. At present it is not known whether that would come under the State Department or under the War Department. There has been a treaty between the United States and Mexico negotiated through the boundary commissioners representing the respective Republics, a treaty which the chairman of the committee and other gentlemen on the committee are somewhat familiar with. They understand that some of the articles of agreement are of vast importance to the Republic of the United States, our country. There are a number of disputed tracts of land called bancos that are settled by this treaty, tracts that have been claimed by the Republic of Mexico. Some of those tracts of land—not exactly bancos, but disputed territory—are worth millions of dollars. As I understand, they are now to be settled by the tentative agreement or treaty. But the Senate can not, of course, ratify the treaty until this survey is made, because we do not know where certain parts of the land will fall when final survey is made. We do know where a good portion of the lands would go; most of them would go to the United States. But there are other bancos that would be cut by the survey, and we do not know until the survey is made where they will go, whether north of the line or south of the line. Under the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo the Rio Grande, the center of the stream, was then declared to be the boundary line, but since that time it has been found that there have been changes in the river bed. Changes occur every year in the alluvial valley there, and there has been for years a controversy between our Government and the Mexican Government as to the ownership of those lands. Some of those tracts are very valuable. One tract is estimated to be worth $20,000,000. That, as I understand, so far as the United States title is concerned, is settled. There is another tract worth $1,000,000.

We understand those matters will be settled through our commissioner, Mr. F. M. Lawson, a very eminent engineer, who has negotiated a treaty with the Mexican boundary commissioner, whereby all these disputed tracts are finally disposed of. Therefore, should it be decided by the administration that the Secretary of State must make this survey, then, of course, an amendment would naturally be placed upon this bill; but in case the War Department should make the survey it would not be necessary. For that reason I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph be returned to if it should turn out that the survey is to be made by the Secretary of State. I will state that it is my opinion that the State Department having initiated the movement and brought about through its able boundary commissioner a treaty agreement, should make the survey preceding same.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to this paragraph at any time before the committee rises to report the bill, in the exigency he refers to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOUNDARY TREATY OF 1925 BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN: INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND CANADA AND ALASKA AND CANADA

To enable the President to perform the obligations of the United States under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain in respect of Canada, signed February 24, 1925; for salaries and expenses, including the salary of the commissioner and salaries of the necessary engineers, clerks, and other employees for duty at the seat of government and in the field; cost of office equipment and supplies; necessary traveling expenses; commutation of subsistence to employees while on field duty not to exceed $4 per day each; for payment for timber necessarily cut in keeping the boundary line clear, not to exceed $500; and for all other necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by the United States in maintaining an effective demarcation of the international boundary line between the United States and Canada and Alaska and Canada under the terms of the treaty aforesaid, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State, $24,750, of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available: Provided, That when the commissioner, or the engineer to the commissioner, shall be absent from Washington or their regular place of residence on official business they shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses of subsistence not to exceed $8 per day each.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, at this time may I ask unanimous consent to return to a previous paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. To which paragraph does the gentleman desire to return?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. To page 14, the paragraph relating to the Foreign Service buildings fund. I have ever so little an amendment I would like to offer to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph on page 14 entitled "Foreign Service buildings fund." Is there objection?

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry, but I will have to object.

The Clerk read as follows:

WATERWAYS TREATY, UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN: INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN

For salaries and expenses, including salaries of commissioners and salaries of clerks and other employees appointed by the commissioners on the part of the United States, with the approval solely of the Secretary of State, cost of law books, books of reference, and periodicals, office equipment and supplies, and necessary traveling expenses, and for one-half of all reasonable and necessary joint expenses of the International Joint Commission incurred under the terms of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the use of boundary waters between the United States and Canada, and for other purposes, signed January 11, 1909, $34,000, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State: Provided, That traveling expenses of the commission or secretary shall be allowed in accordance with the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926: Provided further, That a part of this appropriation may be expended for rent of offices for the commission in the District of Columbia in the event that the Public Buildings Commission is unable to supply suitable office space.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee a question in reference to this item.

Mr. SHREVE. To what item does the gentleman refer?

Mr. NEWTON. It is the item pertaining to the waterways treaty, United States and Great Britain: International Joint Commission, United States and Great Britain. Was there any request made either through the Budget or the International Joint Commission for any additional money for the purpose of completing the survey of the international waters? The gentleman will recall that some money was set aside for the purpose of a survey to be conducted jointly by this country and Canada, the work to be done by this country under the jurisdiction of the Army engineers.

Mr. SHREVE. In reply to the gentleman I will say that on page 217 of the hearings he will find the dialogue which took place:

We will now turn to page 64 and take up the waterways treaty, United States and Great Britain.

Mr. Clark said:

I think that Secretary Smith, who is the disbursing officer of the commission, can probably answer better than I can. In a general way I shall be glad to give you any information I can.

Mr. SHREVE. We are all glad to see that whereas your appropriation for 1928 was $42,000, you have reduced your estimate for 1929 to $34,000.

He said in reply:

We estimated, Mr. Chairman, for $36,000 in the preliminary estimate. We were asked to submit a revised estimate, which I did, of $35,100, taking out a provision of $900 for a messenger.

That is all it is; it was simply that they had lost a messenger.

Then we were asked to submit another revised estimate, which I was unable to do. We had a hearing before the Budget Bureau on the estimate of $35,100, as it stood, and we were later informed that our allotment had been reduced by the Budget Bureau to $34,000. So that is the way it stands, so far as I know.

It was really the loss of one messenger at $900.

Mr. NEWTON. Then I judge from that that no request whatever was made for any addition to this $50,000 that was appropriated two years ago?

Mr. SHREVE. No. They seemed to be getting along very well with the work and we thought that was sufficient for the present at least.

Mr. NEWTON. I was on those waters for about 12 days this summer and visited the camp of the Army engineers there. They are doing a very thorough piece of work, and that is likewise true of the Canadian group of engineers, who are taking care of the western end of it. It was the idea of those with whom I talked that the existing appropriation would be sufficient.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman is correct. We have estimated that the amount granted will be sufficient to finish the work.

Mr. NEWTON. But if they need additional money it certainly ought not to be withheld, because they are doing a very thorough piece of work there.

Mr. SHREVE. We quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I am fully persuaded that if I should be permitted, by the kindness of the committee, to return to a previous paragraph for the purpose of introducing an amendment, perhaps my amendment might go out on a point of order, and yet, with the kindness of the gentlemen here present, I will, at least, I think, be granted permission to state the object I had in view.

On several occasions recently I have visited in our South and Central American countries. I recall one place in particular, one of the principal ports on the Caribbean Sea, the name of the place being Puerto Barrios, in Guatemala. I think it is the only port in Guatemala on the east side. There is immense shipping there, and there sits our American consul in a little wooden building for which our Government pays rent in the sum of $15 a month. It is a shameful surrounding, and brings the blush of shame to the cheek of every American who visits that locality. I had thought, Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment providing for a $30,000 addition to the sum here being appropriated for the purpose of building a consular house at that important port. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that just now, above all times, we as Americans are making a strenuous, and I hope good, effort to win the confidence of those people down there in the disturbed regions; but first of all, it seems to me, before we can win their confidence and respect we ought to do something to win the respect of American citizens who travel down there and see their officials housed in shameful surroundings. I trust that the chairman of our committee in his kindness will be good enough to call this to the attention of those who have this matter in charge, in the hope that something may be done to change that shameful situation down at Puerto Barrios.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I am very happy that the gentleman has brought this matter to the attention of the House, because it offers an opportunity for me to explain that the work of the Foreign Service Building Commission is directly in line with the proposition suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska.

I am going to take just a little time to place in the RECORD a statement in the report about the testimony which was submitted to the committee:

In the testimony that was submitted to the committee it was indicated that the posts that would be considered primarily were those located in tropical and unhealthful sections of the world, the idea being the selection of suitable locations at these posts and erecting thereon buildings that would stand the climatic stresses prevailing, thus alleviating to a large extent the unpleasant and hazardous aspects of service at these points. From the statements made to the committee it is confident that the intent of the act is being carried out efficiently and as expeditiously as different local conditions would warrant.

These men are making studies and spending their summers in these various countries, including the country mentioned by the gentleman, and I am sure it will not be long before the serious situation which has been brought to the attention of the House will be entirely eliminated, and I thank the gentleman most cordially for calling our attention to it.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL AND SPECIAL CLAIMS COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

For the expenses of the settlement and adjustment of claims by the citizens of each country against the other under a convention concluded September 8, 1923, and of citizens of the United States against Mexico under a convention concluded September 10, 1923, between the United States and Mexico, including the expenses which, under the terms of the two conventions, are chargeable in part to the United States, the expenses of the two commissions, and the expenses of an agency of the United States to perform all necessary services in connection with the preparation of the claims and the presenting thereof before the said commissions, as well as defending the United States in cases presented under the general convention by Mexico, including salaries of an agent and necessary counsel and other assistants and employees and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, law books and books of reference, printing and binding, contingent expenses, contract stenographic reporting services, traveling expenses, and such other expenses in the United States and elsewhere as the President may deem proper, $350,000.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN: Page 26, lines 14 to 26, inclusive; page 27, lines 1 to 9, inclusive, strike out all of the section.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment at this time because we are going to appropriate the sum of $350,000 for the work of two commissions that we might as well save to the Government and use for some practical purpose.

These commissions have been in operation since 1923. Many claims have been decided in favor of American citizens, but none of them has been paid, and from the looks of things it does not appear that there will be any effort to pay them. So, why continue commissions and continue to spend money when we are simply sending it after money that is already lost. I think we could use this $350,000 in bettering the conditions of the enlisted men in the Army or we could use it for a thousand and one other purposes instead of wasting it on these commissions, where we get no results. No man would consider it a good business policy to have an expenditure year after year for a particular purpose that was productive of no results. So, why should we spend another $350,000 on these claims commissions when absolutely no attention is paid to the findings of the commissions?

Let us eliminate this expenditure and use it where we can use it to the better advantage of our people and the Government. I trust the amendment will prevail.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I find I must oppose the gentleman's amendment for a very good reason. In the first place, this Claims Commission is making satisfactory progress. We are settling a number of questions with our neighbors to the south of us. One of them was referred to just a little while ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] with respect to the boundary situation. It follows, naturally, that we should settle the claims between the two countries. We are working to this end now. It is rather slow work and will take some time. It will not require a long time, and I think they will be determined in a comparatively short time.

The gentleman is referring to Mexican claims——

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. The gentleman states satisfactory progress has been made. May I ask the gentleman if a single claim has been paid that has been adjudicated by these commissions? Has one claim been paid?

Mr. SHREVE. The idea is that when all the claims from both countries are in then there will be a balance struck. If the United States is owing Mexico, then the United States will pay. If Mexico is owing the United States, then the money will be coming our way. This can not be determined until all the claims are in and a final settlement and adjustment is made.

Mr. BOYLAN. Then this may extend over an interminable period of years?

Mr. SHREVE. I would like to read this statement from a report recently made on the subject:

Prior to July 1, 1926, three sessions of the general commission had been held. At this third session, held during the period from February 1 to March 31, 1926, four claims were heard and decided, but no awards were rendered in favor of either Government. The General Claims Commission held two meetings during the fiscal year of 1927, the last of which ran over into the fiscal year of 1928. During the first session held in the fiscal year of 1927, from October 1 to December 6, which was the fourth session of the commission, the General Claims Commission heard and decided 16 claims of the United States and awarded in favor of the United States $1,896,801.67, and during the same session the General Claims Commission heard and decided six Mexican claims and awarded in favor of Mexico $11,000.

So the gentleman will see the work is going on and it would be a very great mistake to now interrupt the amicable settlement that is eventually going to be made with our neighbor on the south of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL WATER COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

For a study in cooperation with representatives of the Government of Mexico regarding the equitable use of the waters of the lower Rio Grande, of the lower Colorado, and of the Tia Juana Rivers, for the purpose of securing information on which to base a treaty with the Government of Mexico relative to the use of the waters of these rivers for irrigation and other beneficial purposes, including salaries of commissioners and other employees, transportation, subsistence, printing and binding, and such other miscellaneous expenses, including necessary travel to and from points in the Republic of Mexico, as the President may deem proper, $35,000, to be immediately available: Provided, That any moneys contributed by or received from the Republic of Mexico for the purpose of cooperating or assisting in this work shall be available for expenditure for the purposes for which contributed in like manner as if said sums had been specifically appropriated for said purposes.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 14, after the words "immediately available," strike out the proviso reading: "Provided, That any moneys contributed by or received from the Republic of Mexico for the purpose of cooperating or assisting in this work shall be available for expenditure for the purposes for which contributed in like manner as if said sums had been specifically appropriated for said purposes," and insert in lieu thereof the following proviso: "Provided, That any moneys contributed by or received from the Republic of Mexico after the approval of this act, for the purpose of cooperating or assisting in this work shall be available for expenditure, in connection with this appropriation, for the purposes for which contributed in like manner as if said sums had been specifically appropriated for said purposes."

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this slight change of wording in the proviso is because the first deficiency act of 1928, the contribution from Mexico was to revert to the Treasury. In this proviso the contributions received are to be used by the commission for furthering the work, and the amendment which I have offered is to keep the two contributions separated, the one in the deficiency act to revert to the Treasury and the one under this provision to be used by the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT SEVILLE, SPAIN

For expenses of participation, as authorized by public resolution approved March 3, 1925, in an international exposition to be held at Seville, Spain, and for all purposes of the said resolution, including purchase of land, printing and binding, and traveling expenses, $200,000, this appropriation not to be available except for the purposes of participation in the exposition commencing April 27, 1927, or in that exposition postponed to any other date: Provided, That this appropriation and the unexpended balance of the appropriations heretofore made for this purpose shall remain available until June 30, 1930.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to the next provision of the bill referring to the Department of State, I wish to say a few words. I want to say something in reference to the questions that have been asked of certain intended immigrants coming to the United States by the various United States consular agents in European countries. It may sound strange to you, but here are some of the questions.

Here is a question propounded at Warsaw, Poland:

How many feathers has a goose more than a duck?

Other questions:

What is the difference between a man and a woman?
How many legs have three people and two chickens?
How long is a rope?

I am sure no Member of this House ever suspected that such questions were asked immigrants. It is like the old question, "How old is Ann?" or very much like the question Tommy was asked in school, "What is the gender of cat?" and Tommy's answering, "I can't tell until I see the cat." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, I think there should be a stop put to such questions as these. I could not believe my eyes when I had letters coming to me from relatives of immigrants complaining of the questions. To make assurance doubly sure that the questions were correct, I wrote to Mr. Kellogg, Secretary of State, and I included a series of these ridiculous questions. Mr. Kellogg referred my communication to Dr. Hugh S. Cummings, of the Public Health Service, and Doctor Cummings wrote me as follows:

With reference to questions that are being propounded to aliens abroad as a part of the test of their fitness to come to this country, it is advised that questions of the general type as those contained in the list submitted are usually asked of those aliens who are selected for intensive mental examination. All aliens are not subjected to such intensive examination; only those are so subjected who are suspected of being mentally defective, and the propounding of questions of this type is a part of their psychiatric examination. Considered as identities, these questions are manifestly ridiculous, and readily recognized as such by people of normal intelligence. The psychiatric interest in propounding such questions principally attaches to the reaction that the questions produce in the alien's mind, with due regard as to its actual absurdity.

Now, gentlemen of the House, figure to yourselves an alien with the pioneer spirit desiring to come to this country, crossing large stretches from the hinterland, coming to the capital or large city, and being confronted by a consular agent or doctor and asked such questions. Consider the fear and trepidation of the alien. They are not college graduates nor men and women of affairs. For years they have waited to be called in the quota. They will soon see their loved ones and relatives. They are to try their fortunes on a new continent. All these hopes and aspirations only add to their anxiety and worry. Then consider further the asking of the confused alien these ridiculous or, rather, catch questions.

I defy any man or woman to answer these questions and answer them satisfactorily to the man propounding them.

I recall reading that the immigration authorities of Australia gave the inspector the right to ask questions in any language—Hindoostan or Chinese or English or German—and if he wanted to keep an immigrant out, say, because he wore a red necktie and he happened to be a German, the inspector asked the questions in Chinese; and the immigrant having no knowledge of Chinese, of course, could not answer the questions and so was excluded. Australia is now suffering from such tactics, for it is greatly underpopulated. If that is the purpose of these questions, we ought to know it. If they are trick questions, we ought to know that, too. If they are, as Doctor Cummings says, psychiatric tests, then it is well to find out more about them. The study of psychiatry is in its infancy. Little is known about it as a science. It is that branch of medicine, in a limited sense, that relates to mental diseases and their cure. It is the science, or rather art, of psychology applied to mental difficulties. In a way it is an attempt to attune the mind to a new environment or adjust the mind wrenched from old contacts. I do not believe any two men would agree as to its efficacy or limitations. Yet the immigration authorities, Public Health Service, and State Department all rush in where angels fear to tread.

Psychiatrists tell me that infinite care and painstaking is required in these psychiatric tests. A proper examination takes hours, and sometimes days. The examining agents can not and would not devote that length of time and care. They have not the time, in the first place. The best type of psychiatrist is the benign, cordial, affable specialist who can draw out his patient. He must act with finesse and never be heavy handed. Consider the low wages paid in Government service, and I defy anyone to show a psychiatrist worthy of the name in the Public Health or Immigration Service. I do not say this in derogation of these services, but facts are facts, and we have none such.

But, as man to man, I ask, Are such questions fair? Is it just to grade a person as a mental defective because of his answer to the following:

How many teeth has a crow?
How can you make a stove out of butter?
How does a rabbit run?

Intelligence tests of this sort are highly unfair and will, unless stopped, bring upon us widespread and severe criticism from European nations, let alone fair-minded people everywhere.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. As to the questions asked, submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], those are questions that make up part of an intelligence test and have proved to be of great value. These examinations made in European countries are made with the consent of those countries and at the request of those countries. Overseas, in various countries, they have found it to be a great aid to the prospective immigrant to ascertain his mental as well as his physical ability before even starting on the long journey to the United States. Hence these tests. They have resulted in reducing the rejections at Ellis Island, which used to be about 10 per cent of all who arrived, to something less than one-half of 1 per cent. So that that has been a good thing.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. I am sympathetic, as the gentleman knows, with our numerical restriction policy, but it has come to my attention that some of these questions designed to ascertain an applicant's mental alertness and fitness do not seem to reach the point. For example, one question came to my attention, which is somewhat like this: How many feathers has a goose?

Mr. CELLER. That is just what I referred to a moment ago.

Mr. NEWTON. It strikes me that some so-called expert has gotten up a series of questions that are not really fitted to find out whether a person is mentally alert or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If such a question is asked, it is designed to find out whether a man has any intelligence at all. I have never seen the questions, but I know that no one is rejected on failing to answer any one particular question.

I am very glad that I happened to be on the floor when the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] undertook to make some further comments about our immigration laws. He is never satisfied. Before this Congress assembled the distinguished gentleman took occasion last fall in a public meeting in New York to make a tremendous assault upon the Congress itself and some persons in particular, including myself. He contended that those who want to relieve the immigrants should not write to the various Members; that the membership generally did not amount to anything; but that they should write to the Committee on Rules and to two or three leaders whom he named. His speech was all on behalf of the immigrants, of people coming here. He charged me with being an alien hater. That speech of his was printed in brief in the English-speaking papers, and printed in full in a large number of foreign-language papers printed in the United States. I take this opportunity of saying in his presence that I have no feeling of hatred toward any alien whatsoever, but I do have great contempt for alien-minded people in the United States who persist in airing their alien views, and I can not agree with them even if they sit in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. My time has expired. I yield the floor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I do not think it is necessary for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Immigration, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], to express his contempt for any Member of the House who may have views and ideas that do not exactly coincide with his own. There is no question as to the necessity for restricted immigration. I believe that the consensus of opinion in this House is that the economic conditions of Europe and the United States are such at this time that the bars should not entirely be let down. But some of us who are in direct contact with this human problem look at it from a different angle, and because we are affected by the tragedies and the sorrows that attend a strict interpretation of the act in its effect upon hundreds and thousands of families, and we seek to alleviate that condition, in keeping with the recommendation of the President of the United States in two or three successive messages to Congress, I think it unfair for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Immigration to take exception to such manifestation of humanitarian instincts. The hardship which has resulted is in the separation of families. The President of the United States has referred to it in his messages on more than two or three occasions. What we seek is to simply humanize this law so as to make possible a union of families permanently settled in this country, and to so arrange it that aged parents may come here to join the family permanently. In many instances we have the case of a citizen of the United States who sends for his wife and children, and because one child happens to be over the age of 18 having that child kept back and not permitted to come with her mother in joining her own father in this country. That is the kind of hardship that confronts us, and surely we ought to have the right to come on the floor of this House and to point out these conditions without being ourselves pointed out and held up as "alien-mined."

I believe that at the proper time the Committee on Immigration will go into this matter in an impartial manner and give us an opportunity to bring these facts home to the committee. The Secretary of Labor knows of the hardships the present law is causing, and I am sure he would not oppose an amendment to the law to humanize it in harmony with the dictates of humanity, as the President of the United States says.

The condition pointed out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] I know something about, because I served as an interpreter in the immigration service 20 years ago. I attended daily the inspection of these immigrants on the part of the public health officials. It was my duty to interpret some of these silly questions that are put to the alien with the ostensible purpose of determining his mental fitness to enter this country.

If such questions are put, it is necessary to take into consideration the background, the bringing up, and the environment of an alien. I have seen aliens certified as being feeble-minded, aliens coming from a mountain region, asked questions about the water, about the sea, about rivers. I have seen aliens who were raised on fishing smacks in the ports of Europe certified as being feeble-minded because they could not answer questions about land animals and wild life.

That is unfair. It gives too much latitude to a medical inspector. That is not his function. His function and his duty is to determine the physical condition of an alien. As long as we are to have these educational tests an alien who comes from a small community, who is a peasant, certainly can not answer questions on airplanes and aviation or on chemistry. Yet an alien who comes from a seaport town and is probably a fisherman by occupation is expected to answer questions to the satisfaction of a medical inspector on matters pertaining to farming, so that a great deal of discretion and open-minded fairness is necessary in order to apply these tests with any degree of impartiality. In many and many instances it is not a fair test at all. I have personally witnessed cases of aliens certified as feeble-minded who were not feeble-minded at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Concerning any effort that may be made for the admission of wives and children to aliens domiciled in the United States, the situation is well illustrated by a part of the gentleman's statement just made. First comes an appeal for the wives and children. Before it can be acted on the appeal enlarges so that it is for fathers and mothers, and then for grandfathers and grandmothers, and then for orphaned children and stepchildren and adopted children, and sisters, and cousins, aunts, and uncles. I submit that if the gentleman will look at any of the committee's hearings where any of the proceedings have been recorded he will find that immediately when the first amendment is considered there has been an effort to stampede the hearing into the consideration of the next line of relatives, and so on.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would not be so if these relatives were kept within the total quota number of any country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; but few of those who appeal are willing to take half a loaf.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the gentleman had better ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. CELLER. Yes. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I believe it was Voltaire who said many years ago:

I do not agree with a word you say, and yet would defend to the death your right to say it.

Now, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] will not believe a word I say, but at least if he believes in free speech in this House and the right of untrammeled discussion he should defend to the death my right to say it. There is no question but that these tests have been made and made repeatedly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I made my reference entirely to the speech made by the gentleman in New York City at a time when the Congress was not in session.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman's vituperative remarks spring from a desire not to correct me but to vent spleen and animus on a gentleman who disagrees with him. The gentleman is most intolerant of criticism. Any man who resents fair discussion and criticism is either a fool or a knave. He can have his choice. I yield to no man in my respect for the high-minded Members of this House and for the traditions of this House, but I protest that it is unfair that I should be abused simply because I bring forth questions here that are continually asked of intending immigrants. I leave it to the sense of fairness of gentlemen here to determine whether I am within my rights as a Member of this House to come here and speak my word and have my say.

The gentleman from Washington seeks to draw a red herring across the trail by referring to certain remarks of mine made in New York, but apparently candor does not reside in him, and therefore the statement that he makes as to my utterance is entirely erroneous.

I came before this membership with a simple proposition wherein I indicated that certain questions were being asked immigrants which are manifestly unfair, if not ridiculous. I submitted a communication from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, wherein he admits that these questions were asked. I thus produced corroboration. Because I dared truthfully to point out what I deemed to be an abuse of powers intrusted to an examining official I am to be the subject of a personal attack and a subject of mean remarks by the gentleman from Washington.

With reference to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], I will say that he has done practically nothing to unite families who have been divided by the wide expanse of ocean and by the immigration act. He has never raised a finger in all humanity and decency to enable the husband to bring his wife to this country or to enable a father or mother to place their loving arms around their children now abroad. I believe there is not a person in this House who would seek to strike at and undermine family life in that way.

If the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Immigration would allow a bill to come to this House for the purpose of uniting families, the House would pass it, 434 to 1. Mr. JOHNSON would record the only negative vote. Yet he has attempted by every tactical device known to parliamentary procedure in the committee to bottle up that bill, and when relief was given in the Senate at the last session he is the man who did everything in his power to prevent that bill from seeing the daylight in his own committee, and it still sleeps peacefully in that committee. I refer to the bill introduced by Senator Wadsworth.

The gentleman from Washington is the one who always believes that an alien has horns, that he is the very embodiment of the devil, and must be kept out at all hazards. Despite the fact that we have restricted immigration, he comes forth with a proposed enactment that would provide that immigration must be cut down still further to the tune of 10 per cent every year for five years. He would cut it down 50 per cent. Surely he has no love for the alien and resents deeply any statement casting in any degree any reflection upon the immigration laws and their administration.

He fails to realize what a vast power is given to the consular agents in their being permitted to ask questions along the lines of intelligence tests. The United States courts have held that there can be no appeal from a decision of a consular agent excluding an immigrant as a result of any kind of examination or test. These agents therefore become laws unto themselves. They are uncontrolled. How much more inequitable, therefore, seem the following questions when applied to the weary, travel-worn, frightened alien who applies to come to the United States. I pointed out in my previous remarks that it was no excuse to say that these questions are a part of a psychiatric test to grade mental defectives.

These questions are unscientific and most unfair. In fact, the Fourth International Conference for the Protection of Migrants, held recently at Geneva, passed a resolution recommending reform of the American system of examination.

General dissatisfaction with the American method of examining applicants in Warsaw, the outlet for Poland, is reported by Miss Kate H. Claghorn, of the New York School of Social Work, 105 East Twenty-second Street, who has recently returned from Europe after an independent investigation.

Although unable because of lack of time to meet the American physician who gives the tests, Miss Claghorn learned from rejected applicants, emigrant-aid officials, and the Polish press that the American examiner does not speak Polish, does not keep a record of the questions asked and the answers given, and is not familiar with the background and habits of a Polish peasant.

Knowledge of the applicant's mode of life and thought is important in considering his reactions to questions such as those used by the American officials, Miss Claghorn argues.

It is outrageous to give a person the grading of a mental defective because he can not answer these questions.

Miss Claghorn said:

Imagine the unfairness of asking a Polish peasant, "What is the difference between coal and wood?" Coal is not used for fuel by Polish peasants and many have never seen it. Yet this question is frequently given and failure to answer it satisfactorily contributes toward a decision that the applicant is mentally deficient.

In passing, the correct answer to the coal and wood question is—

Coal furnishes more heat than wood.

Harold Fields, executive director of the League for American Citizenship, gave the case of a woman who was rejected by the American examiner in Warsaw for failure to answer these questions properly:

How many shores has the ocean?
Name the months backward.
When a ship burns and the passengers fall into the ocean, on what do they live?
What is the difference between coal and wood?
What is the difference between iron and silver?
What is the difference between stone and eggs?

This woman was subsequently examined by a psychiatrist in Warsaw. Mr. Fields has an affidavit from the psychiatrist stating that the women is normal, having no symptoms of mental defect.

From my examination of this entire subject I am convinced that, despite assurances given by the Surgeon General, who is in Washington, and perhaps does not know exactly what is going on in Europe, these tests are deliberately used to discriminate against certain classes of aliens and against aliens particularly who are of a certain faith. Without going too deeply into the subject at this time, there were turned down as mental defectives at Warsaw 23 out of 50 applicants. In 1925, I am informed, under new quota law, that of 10,000 Jews admitted only 4 were turned back after mental tests. These latter figures are given by N. Oken, foreign correspondent for the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, which is known as the H. I. A. S. To complete the absurd picture let me give you some more of these questions:

How many teeth has a crow?
How many stars are there in heaven?
What is the difference between the sky and the earth?
What is glass made of?
Which flies better, a bird or a fly?
What is the difference between a fly and a butterfly?
What is a balloon?
What is the difference between a train and an automobile?
Which is heavier, a pound of corn or a pound of feathers?
What is the difference between a tree and a log?
What happens if you put an egg under a stone?
If a cat happens to be running around in the streets at 2 o'clock at night and the houses are all closed, where does she run in?
If I come near my house and find it burning, what should I do?
How many legs has an American cat?
If I lost my purse with money in it in a circular garden, from which end would I begin to hunt for the purse?
If you are walking in the street and tumble over a cat, what would you do?
What is the difference between a potato and an apple?

There is one question they forgot to ask. What is the difference between a cat and a kitten? It takes two cats to make one kitten, but only one kitten to make a cat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, when the distinguished chairman of the Immigration Committee [Mr. JOHNSON] was speaking, I asked him to yield for a question, but unfortunately his time was about up. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he was in a mood to withdraw the scurrilous and erroneous remarks that he inserted in the RECORD last Friday. Speaking, perhaps, during the heat of debate, he did not entirely mean to use the language that he did. I will ask him now if in all fairness he would not desire to correct part of his remarks made in debate last Friday?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is the gentleman addressing his question to me?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think, as a matter of fact, if the gentleman refers to my remarks with regard to the Governor of New York in his handling of criminals released from New York penitentiaries that I should amplify and explain the remarks for the benefit of the people of the entire United States.

Mr. BOYLAN. Which answer shows that the gentleman is not only misinformed but that he persists in his ignorance. He stated to the House that a supreme court justice in the State of New York was going to naturalize 10,000 citizens in one day. Just imagine a man coming to the age of reason and having the wonderful experience to be obtained in this great university, the Congress of the United States, arising here and in all sincerity repeating that he would amplify his remarks and say that any justice or anyone anywhere not endowed with supernatural powers could examine 10,000 applicants for naturalization in one day and make them citizens of the United States. I am surprised that the gentleman, whom I have always regarded as being of the finest caliber and a man of intelligence, representing the great Northwest section of these United States, should be carried away by prejudice—I will not say anything else—that although he has committed an error and although his attention is called to it yet he persists in his error. What will we say of a man who has been informed that he has committed a mistake and who is not big enough and broad enough to recognize it and to admit it? I say the man does not live who does not make mistakes. I am always suspicious of a man or woman who says he or she can not make a mistake, because it is human to err, but to persist in error!

What will we say of a man of that kind, who can be so blinded by prejudice, and so obscured by ignorance that the light can never penetrate his cranium? The smoke screen surrounding him is such in its density that unless we make use of the new invention spoken of here a few days ago, whereby a ray of light can penetrate almost any fog, unless we have the benefit of that invention we shall never be able to penetrate the gentleman's intelligence. In the ordinary course of events, man to man, and gentleman to gentleman, if attention is called to something perhaps uttered in the heat of debate or the stress of the moment, why naturally, a correction would probably be made. I speak of the intercourse between gentleman and gentleman. But if such correction is not made in the proper spirit what can we think? What can be our estimate of that type of man? I say that in all fairness, the gentleman should arise, in all decency and all honesty, and ask that his remarks be expunged from the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I was inclined to think that when the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] took the floor he would come to the defense of Gov. Al Smith——

Mr. CELLER. He needs no defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And his attitude with regard to paroles and pardons of convicted criminals; but it seems that the burden of his talk was with regard to my statement that a class of 10,000 immigrants was about to be naturalized in New York last Thursday, January 5. I received my information that there was such a class from the secretary to Judge Cotillo, of one of the courts of New York State. With that letter from the secretary I received a copy of an address to the class of 10,000 to be delivered at 10 o'clock that morning by Judge Cotillo, and in that address Judge Cotillo warned all of these prospective citizens, soon to take the oath of allegiance, that they must cease to be fascists and anti-fascists and try to be Americans. It turns out, and I am quite willing to make this correction, that the great class of 10,000 was not put through at once, because, as we might have supposed, the court found it could not quite handle that many at one time. However, they are putting them through in blocks of 125, I believe. The papers are full of pictures of it and I shall ask permission, now, to insert in the RECORD comments from some of the New York papers about the making of this gigantic class of citizens, even though it is not all done in the twinkling of an eye and even though Judge Cotillo sent out his address as if addressed to the whole 10,000 personally present. However, whether it is done in a day or a week, this making of citizens by wholesale is done by naturalized judges themselves, who themselves sometimes seem to wear alien spectacles. It is being done too fast for the good of the United States, in my opinion, and the process should be slowed down by law.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Was it not good advice that Judge Cotillo gave to these prospective citizens?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but it was advice given by a judge who naturalizes too many men and too fast.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Do the press articles state how many interpreters it required to explain the purport of this judge's address to the minds of these 10,000 aliens?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, my dear sir, in the courts of New York the proceedings are so loose as regards the actual use of the English language that an interpreter is hardly needed.

Mr. BLANTON. The law provides that they must both speak and understand the English language before they may be naturalized, but there is hardly a judge in the United States who carries out that provision of the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. My experience is a good, round grunt goes for the English language in some courts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, they are all examined by United States examiners. The judge has no discretion as to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In conclusion let me say that part of this debate sounds very much like the mail I receive in quantities every day, which does not disturb me at all.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With pleasure.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman know that the entire administration of the naturalization machinery in the counties of New York and Kings lies entirely with the Naturalization Bureau and the United States district courts? You took that power away from the New York State courts and placed it exclusively in the United States District Court for the Eastern and Southern Districts of New York. If you complain now about naturalization in New York City you have yourself to blame. Give back jurisdiction to the New York Supreme Court in Kings County (Brooklyn) and New York County (Manhattan).

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do not address me in the second person, please.

Mr. CELLER. That power was taken away from the State courts and it is now lodged in the United States courts in the two great counties referred to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me ask the gentleman, Is Judge Cotillo's court a State court or a United States court?

Mr. CELLER. It is a State court, but that is in Bronx County.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the applicants are all examined by the United States examiners.

Mr. CELLER. The whole thing is done by the United States Naturalization Service, with which, of course, the gentleman is familiar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Quite so. We will get along very well, I presume, and perhaps in time we can change the naturalization laws somewhat. I shall introduce such a bill to-morrow.

The Clerk read as follows:

Detection and prosecution of crimes: For the detection and prosecution of crimes against the United States; for the protection of the person of the President of the United States; the acquisition, collection, classification, and preservation of criminal identification records and their exchange with the officials of States, cities, and other institutions; for such other investigations regarding official matters under the control of the Department of Justice and the Department of State as may be directed by the Attorney General; hire, maintenance, upkeep, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles when necessary; firearms and ammunition, such stationery and supplies for use at the seat of government or elsewhere as the Attorney General may direct, including not to exceed $10,000 for taxicab hire to be used exclusively for the purposes set forth in this paragraph and to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General; traveling expenses; including not to exceed $210,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, and including a Director of the Bureau of Investigation at not exceeding $7,500 per annum, $2,250,000: Provided, That for the purpose of executing the duties for which provision is made by this appropriation, the Attorney General is authorized to appoint officials who shall be vested with the authority necessary for the execution of such duties.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking a question. What is the authority of law for this proviso? It is clearly legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SHREVE. There is no such authority. It is just a tie-up made necessary to complete the program and carry out the ideas of the Attorney General.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no legislation authorizing it?

Mr. SHREVE. If the gentleman means an act of Congress containing this exact language, I will say there is no such provision.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean authorizing the language of this proviso?

Mr. SHREVE. There is none.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I make the point of order, since the chairman admits there is no law authorizing it; it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and should come out on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas direct his point of order to the proviso or the entire paragraph?

Mr. BLANTON. Just against the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, including experts at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, including not to exceed $55,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, $200,000: Provided, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the following language on page 35, beginning at line 22, reading as follows:

Provided, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful.

I make the point of order for the reason it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and that it interferes with the discretion that is lodged in the heads of our departments.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman makes that point of order, I make a point of order on the balance of the section.

Mr. BLANTON. We will cross those bridges when we get to them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will reserve a point of order on the balance of the section down to line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SHREVE. I simply wish to say that both provisos are limitations on an appropriation bill and entirely in order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe they are, but if one is not in order, I submit the other is not in order, and if the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his point of order I will withdraw mine.

Mr. BLANTON. No; we will act on our own judgments. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, but what this language against which I have made the point of order is legislation, unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and should come out. It has been held time and time again that this is not a limitation but is subject to a point of order. It interferes with the discretion that every department head ought to be able to exercise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania recall that in the last Congress, when similar provisos on similar appropriations were objected to and points of order made against them, the gentleman at that time conceded the points of order and the points of order were sustained?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the points of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me just a minute on that proposition? The law under which antitrust suits are prosecuted makes these exceptions in that law. The antitrust act excepts both labor and agriculture from the provisions of the act.

Mr. BLANTON. No; my friend from Oklahoma is mistaken, as such laws do not authorize these provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. In so far as those provisions have any effect, they go beyond this and are unquestionably legislation on an appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TERRITORIAL COURTS

Alaska: Four judges, at $10,000 each; four attorneys, at $5,000 each; four marshals, at $4,000 each; four clerks, at $3,800 each; in all, $91,200.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Were it not for a constitutional inhibition, I would offer an amendment limiting the payment of the salary of a judge of Alaska. The term of a judge of Alaska expired, and his renomination was sent to the Senate. A committee investigated, and requested the President of the United States to withdraw the name. The President withdrew the name, but left him in office. He has been in office, although his term expired four years ago. He has been in office over a year.

There is a peculiar provision in the law of Alaska. It provides that a district judge shall remain in office until his successor is appointed, the purpose being clear to avoid having a vacancy on the bench until his successor is appointed.

The attention of the comptroller of the United States was called to this, and the comptroller held that, owing to the peculiar provision in the law creating this judgeship, he was compelled to approve of the payment of this man's salary.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The law provides that the district judge shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In this case his name was sent in for reappointment and the Senate had it withdrawn. It then was without the advice and consent of the Senate because of the failure to confirm. Then, in order to get around the law, to thwart the purpose of the law, this man has been allowed to remain in office and no appointment has been made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If it were a United States district judge, there is no doubt that the comptroller would not have approved of the payment of the salary, because it would have been a recess appointment.

Mr. BLANTON. Failing to appoint some one else, the law is thwarted; is that the case?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the case. Such a condition tends to destroy the respect and confidence in the courts which is necessary to uphold the dignity and respect for the courts. The good people of Alaska know these conditions, and necessarily they must have a feeling when they go before the judge that they are before a judge who is not properly accredited in accordance with the law.

An amendment limiting his salary would not be in order because the judge's salary can not be diminished during his term of office, and for that reason I do not offer such an amendment. But the House should know the condition that exists in Alaska, and I hope the President will soon name a judge who will meet all the requirements and receive the confirmation of the Senate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman does not contest the proposition that in this case the actual term of service of the judge extends until his successor is appointed?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the law.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So that he is serving in his term; it is a part of his term, and his term does not expire until his successor is appointed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will not deny that he was appointed for a term of only four years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman knows that charges were preferred and in an investigation made by the Department of Justice these charges were not sustained. It is not meet and proper for us to discuss matters that may come up in the Senate when confirmation might take place.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from Washington as to the fact that the charges were not sustained. They were sustained by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. That committee consisted of such men as Mr. Cummins, Mr. OVERMAN, and the Senator from Colorado. The charges were sustained, and they held that this man was guilty of corrupt practices.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It is well not to have any camouflage about this proposition but to understand the real facts. The Delegate from Alaska has stated the facts. This judge was appointed and confirmed and took the oath of office for a certain specific term of four years.

That time expired. The President then sent his name to the Senate for reappointment. It so happens, forsooth, that the law applicable to Alaska with respect to judges is the same as the law that is applicable in some States with respect to State officers, that after the term of a man's office is expired, he continues to hold the office until his successor is appointed and has qualified. The President alone can not appoint a judge for Alaska and have him serve. It takes the joint action of the Senate with him. It is by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I have as much respect and regard for the Republican President of the United States as any other Democrat in the United States. I was one of those who first congratulated him when he became President. I respect very highly certain services that he has rendered the Government of the United States, but he is not too big for proper criticism. There is no officer of the United States who is too big for just criticism, and when he deliberately fails and refuses to appoint somebody else who will be approved by the United States Senate, he is not carrying out the purpose and intent of the law; and, as the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND] truthfully says, the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate that investigated this man did turn him down, and it was upon their action that the Senate of the United States refused to confirm him.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. We do not want the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] to come in here and darken the waters and becloud the atmosphere with an innuendo which he himself is trying to put into the case as an excuse for the action of the President of the United States.

Mr. McKEOWN. Would it not be proper for Congress to refuse the salary of this man?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is a good enough lawyer to recognize the situation when he says that this judge is entitled to his salary as long as he holds the office, and Congress is without power to diminish it one dollar when considering this appropriation bill, although by proper legislation it could abolish his office.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] are confusing this case as being the same as a United States judge, whereas this man is a Territorial judge.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we have not confused it at all. The gentleman from New York and myself have the situation very well clarified. We have been stating the facts. It is the bellwether of the Republican Party from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] and his collaborator from Illinois [CHINDBLOM] who are trying to confuse and becloud the issue.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not the gentleman know that the Congress can abolish every Territorial judge?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the Congress can abolish him, yes, by legislative procedure, but the Congress has not attempted to do that. This is an appropriation bill which we are now considering, and we have got to appropriate the money to pay every officer of the United States, whether he is properly or improperly in office, and as long as this man is judge we have to pay him his salary. Let us not becloud the issue. Let us understand it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has stated this case exactly, and I commend him for it and approve of his statement.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I rise only to say this: I confess that I am not as familiar with the facts in the case as some other gentlemen may be, and I am not arguing on the facts with reference to the service of this judge in question, but I insist that this judge was appointed for a term consisting of four years—and until his successor shall be appointed; and he was confirmed by the United States Senate for a term of four years—and until his successor shall be appointed. He is a judge until his successor shall be appointed.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDLBOM. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman would not contend that the Congress could not abolish the whole thing at any time, does he?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. By legislation?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly, Congress can do that. This is a statutory position.

Mr. McKEOWN. And could also eliminate the salary.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That would have to be done by legislative enactment. We are now engaged in the consideration of an appropriation bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], familiar as he is with the rules of the House, recognizes that any proposal of that sort would be subject to a point of order at this time. I make the point that this judge is serving within the term for which he was appointed, and for which his appointment was confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman contend that he may serve indefinitely for life?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He may serve until his successor is appointed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I concede his original term, and yet at the end of four years the intention is that the President shall reappoint him or appoint a successor. There is no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments are withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 483, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings."

APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARSHALS, DISTRICT ATTORNEYS, CLERKS, AND OTHER EXPENSES OF UNITED STATES COURTS

For salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, including services rendered in behalf of the United States or otherwise, services in Alaska in collecting evidence for the United States when so specially directed by the Attorney General, traveling expenses, purchase when authorized by the Attorney General of two motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles at not to exceed $2,500 each, and maintenance, alteration, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles used in connection with the transaction of the official business of the United States marshals, $3,672,500: Provided, That there shall be paid hereunder any necessary cost of keeping vessels or other property attached or libeled in admiralty in such amount as the court, on petition setting forth the facts under oath, may allow.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order first on the proviso.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On page 40, line 6, strike out "$3,672,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,722,500."

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman want the point of order decided first?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order and ask the Chairman this question, What authority in law is there for the proviso on page 40?

Mr. SHREVE. Does the gentleman make a point of order on the proviso?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SHREVE. I think it is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and the gentleman in charge admits it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: on Page 40, line 6, strike out "$3,672,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,722,500."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment, I am sure that every man here will agree to this amendment. This is to increase the salaries of the deputy marshals throughout the United States. There is an increase provided in this bill of $22,500, $15,000 of which is to be used to increase salaries of marshals, leaving an increase over last year's appropriation of $7,500 to increase the salaries of the deputy marshals.

There are 884 deputy marshals throughout the United States, and the increase provided for in this bill is just a little less than $10 a year for a deputy marshal. I have here in my hand a letter from the Department of Justice, dated December 17, 1927, in reply to a letter which I sent, asking that the deputy marshals in the larger cities, particularly in New York—and there are many other similarly situated—be given a decent living salary. I suggest the same salary as is paid to a police officer in the same city.

I am informed that last year a deputy marshal in the service of the Government received $1,320 a year, or about $25 a week. The gentleman states that there has been a slight increase, about $5 a month. In some cases, in the eastern district of New York, they are paid on an average of $1,500; that is about $125 a month. There are one or two men who receive $1,700, but the average pay is about $1,500 a year.

These deputy marshals now have important duties to perform. They have dangerous duties to perform. They must apprehend criminals; they serve warrants; they serve papers in injunction cases. Now, if you gentlemen believe in the law you say you believe in, if you want enforcement of the law, you can not expect a deputy United States marshal getting $25 a week to go out and arrest bootleggers who will flash a $1,000 bill in his eye to have sufficiently good eyesight to serve injunction papers where personal and correct service of papers are required. I suggest that you pay these men the same salary that you pay patrolmen in New York City.

Let me read the department's answer to my letter:

The department would, of course, be glad to fix the compensation of deputies in accordance with your suggestion if the appropriation would permit it, but, as a matter of fact, the appropriations will not permit it.

As a matter of fact the deputy marshals are underpaid. I provide here $50,000 additional to give these men a decent living wage.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How many of these deputy marshals devote their entire time to this business? Do any of them?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; they all do in New York City, both in the southern and eastern district of New York.

Mr. SNELL. How many have you there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe that between the eastern and the southern districts of New York we have about 70 deputy marshals.

Mr. SNELL. I think they should have more pay. In my country and other portions of the country in country districts they do not give their entire time to the service of the Government as deputy marshals. I imagine that a great many of them have something else, and they only do this business as a side line. When they do that perhaps the pay now given is sufficient, but where they give their entire attention to the Government business it seem to me they ought to be paid much more.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman support the amendment if I reduce it to $25,000?

Mr. SNELL. Is it the law that every one of them shall be paid the same amount?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. The Attorney General fixes that. We appropriate a lump sum. The Attorney General distributes it. He takes the location and such things into consideration. I am willing to trust the Attorney General, because he knows the conditions. Why, in New York City I know of a case of one deputy marshal where the marshal had to put him on to drive a van because the man could not buy a new suit of clothes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just as a healthy body can resist disease if well fed, so an official can resist temptation if properly paid.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman knows that in the eastern district, covering the city of Brooklyn, they have 10 deputy marshals, and the appropriation is short, and in order to let them get any pay whatsoever they had to change their designation from deputy marshals to sailors, some of them with families to support, receiving only $800 or $900 a year.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that the man who gives his entire time to the Government gets only $800 or $900 a year?

Mr. CELLER. Yes. That is the fact. In order to give them any money whatsoever they had to change their designation, and when you go to court you will see the badges on them marked "Sailors," and not deputy marshals.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When they take prisoners down to Atlanta they are on duty continually four days, night and day.

Mr. McKEOWN. In Oklahoma, in the oil fields, where we have an enormous tide of crime and where the deputy marshals in the oil fields are worked night and day all through that country, they receive very small pay.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. I wish to state to the gentleman in that connection that in Montana they are all full-time men and work not only under difficult but dangerous conditions at small wages.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I urge the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that last year we increased the appropriation $78,320 in the deficiency bill, which, of course, failed. We are carrying that along this year and we are also adding $22,500, which makes a total of $100,820. I desire to call the attention of the committee still further to the report:

The estimate presented to the committee for this branch of the service was $3,672,500, an increase over the current year of $22,500. The committee added an additional amount of $7,500 over the Budget estimate, making the total amount available for 1929, $3,672,500, or an increase over 1928 of $22,500. The increase in this appropriation is due to the proposed adjustment of the compensation of the United States marshals themselves, particularly those receiving lower rates of compensation, and to the additional expense caused by the creation of the new middle district of North Carolina. The minimum salaries of marshals is now $3,000 and the maximum $6,500. A majority of the marshals receive less than $4,500 per annum. It is proposed to use in the neighborhood of $15,000 for increasing the lower salaries of marshals, and the additional amount added by the committee of $7,500 is to be applied to the salaries of deputy marshals in the lower grades. It will be recalled that the committee recommended and Congress approved an additional amount last year of $78,320 for salary increases of about 690 deputies in the lower-salary grades.

The ones the gentleman refers to.

This readjustment has been put into effect and the $7,500 mentioned is to apply to some few cases which could not be reached by the larger amounts made available.

Those are the facts. I might add that we have 2 deputies at $3,100; 4 at $2,925; 14 at $2,657; 74 at $2,397; 46 at $2,185; 78 at $1,863; 220 at $1,708; 396 at $1,634; and 50 at $1,402.

Of course, gentlemen of the committee will understand that in cities like the great city of New York the deputy marshals and all court officials have a great deal to do and more than they have to do in some of the interior parts of the country, where they really have very little to do. So we have endeavored, in making these small increases, to take care of those most needy, those in cities where their labors are more exacting and where their expenses are higher. We want to help a little each year, and we want to do something more to help next year.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has correctly stated that the information before our committee was that the minimum pay was over $1,400. We certainly had no information that deputy marshals were paid salaries as low as $800 or $900, and I think, perhaps, that may be based on what occurred in the past.

Last year this amount was increased, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, by about $78,000, increased again $22,000, and then $7,500. The Attorney General has vested in him the discretion to make increases which he thinks are deserving, and it occurred to us that we are paying deputy marshals an adequate amount when compared with the pay of many other Government employees. If you will take up the question of salaries, you will find there are a great many whom you may think are underpaid, yet there are so many people occupying these places who are anxious to keep them, and who are paid from $1,400 to $3,000, that your committee did not feel authorized to grant increases suggested by the friends of individual employees. So we have left it to the discretion of the Attorney General.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman from Alabama has correctly stated the opinion of the committee.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It seems to me the statement in the report is a little confusing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The report says, first, that the estimate presented to the committee for this branch of the service was $3,672,500; then it says the committee added an additional amount of $7,500 over the Budget estimate, making the total amount available for 1929, $3,672,500, which is the same amount.

Mr. SHREVE. That is a typographical error. That is all I can say to the gentleman. It should be $3,665,000, and then we made the increase.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The first figure should be $3,665,000?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. To which you added $7,500?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So there is an increase of $7,500?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will state to the gentleman that the same conditions exist in the city of Chicago as in New York, and it would be very helpful to the Department of Justice if we could find our way clear to pay better salaries to these men.

Mr. SHREVE. Let me say that the committee has very carefully considered all of these matters. This is a very large bill, carrying many salary items. I will say to the committee that we would be very glad to increase them, but we are doing something each time. We have made this increase, and I feel we have gone just as far as we can go in this bill. Therefore I regret I am compelled to oppose the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Are these salaries as high as those paid in other departments?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; in fact, some of the other departments are not getting as much. Of course, as gentlemen well know, the whole salary basis of the Government service is low.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, may I speak on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of a letter which I addressed to the Attorney General some time ago on this subject and a letter received from General Lord, Director of the Budget. I have given this matter a great deal of attention since I have been in Congress——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the call for a vote on the amendment be withdrawn and that the gentleman may have five minutes. This problem of the pay of marshals in the western country is a serious one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alaska may be recognized for five minutes to discuss the amendment pending. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, in the letter referred to I call the attention of the Attorney General and also the attention of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to the fact that the minimum salary allowed to prohibition agents under the new law is $2,400 a year, and yet we have many deputy marshals in Alaska who are getting $1,680 and a great many who are getting $1,800. This means they are getting about $5 a day. There is an absolute inconsistency in paying the prohibition agents a much larger salary than we pay the deputy marshals. A deputy marshal is usually a very intelligent man, and has to have some education and some knowledge of law—at least some knowledge of evidence—and yet he is placed in a scale away below similar employees of the Bureau of Prohibition in regard to compensation for his services.

I have in mind one deputy marshal in Alaska who was paid $225 a month. In 1926 his salary was cut to $175 a month. This means he gets $5.83 a day. He is a man without a family. His board costs him just $4 a day, so that he has $1.83 cents remaining with which to pay for his clothing and his other usual and necessary living expenses. The reason given for this, I assume, is that the business of the office declined somewhat. Of course, the living expenses of the deputy marshal did not decline at all, but under the system in the Department of Justice they simply cut the salary of the deputy to fit the decline in business of the office.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under my amendment the money goes into a lump sum, and it would take care of the situation in the gentleman's Territory in accordance with his letter to the Attorney General.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

General Lord, in his reply to my letter, stated:

I am glad to receive the information which you have submitted in relation to this question and assure you that the matter will be given careful attention when the estimates for 1929 are considered next fall.

This letter was written in June of last year. He gave it careful consideration and gave them a raise of $10 a year, according to the estimate that was presented.

I do not wish to occupy any more time of the committee and repeat my request for permission to insert this correspondence in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not a fact that the first or senior assistant to the United States marshal has to have the capacity of a bank cashier?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the next assistant has to have knowledge of office affairs? In other words, they are not all men out in the field serving papers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is quite true; and the deputy marshals in Alaska are required to put up a bond. The marshal requires them to have fidelity bonds made out to him when they take office, and they have to do all of this on $5 a day.

Permission was granted for the insertion of the following matter:

MAY 31, 1927.

Hon. JOHN G. SARGENT,
Attorney General of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write to call your attention to the inadequate salaries now being paid to deputy United States marshals in Alaska.

This matter came to my attention recently when I learned that a number of the Alaskan deputies were taking the civil-service examination for employment in the Prohibition Bureau, where the salaries paid are much higher than in the offices of the United States marshals.

There are many of your deputies in Alaska receiving $1,800, and in some cases less than that amount, per annum, while under the new organization of the Prohibition Unit the minimum salary is fixed at $2,400 per annum for prohibition agents. This is termed "entrance salary." It appears that the lowest salary to be paid in that department is $1,860 per annum.

DUTIES OF PROHIBITION AGENTS COMPARED WITH DEPUTY MARSHALS

Under the provisions of the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L. 324–325), the powers and duties of United States marshals are prescribed as follows:

"The deputy marshals shall be ex officio constables and executive officers of the commissioners herein provided for, and shall have the powers and discharge the duties of United States deputy marshals, and also those of constables, under the laws of the United States applicable to said District."

The powers and duties of prohibition agents are set forth as follows in the act of October 28, 1919, national prohibition act (41 Stat. L. 307, sec. 5):

"The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, and all other officers of the United States whose duty it is to enforce criminal laws, shall have all the power for the enforcement of the war prohibition act or any provisions thereof which is conferred by law for the enforcement of existing laws relating to the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors under the laws of the United States."

It will be noted that under this provision of law a deputy United States marshal in Alaska is made responsible for the enforcement of the prohibition law in addition to his duties of constable and server of process.

DEPUTY MARSHALS ENFORCE THE PROHIBITION LAW IN ALASKA

The enforcement of the prohibition law has devolved almost entirely upon the deputy marshals throughout the Territory of Alaska.

The prohibition organization of Alaska consists of a director and three agents, a force so small when the immense area of the Territory is considered that it can accomplish but little in restricting the liquor traffic. Therefore throughout all Alaska the deputy marshals are enforcing this law with but very limited assistance from the prohibition organization and for much less compensation than prohibition agents receive.

QUALIFICATIONS OF DEPUTY MARSHALS

The standard of physical and mental requirements of deputy marshals is as high as that of prohibition agents. As much intelligence and education is required in the administration of a deputy marshal's office as in that of a prohibition agent. In fact, a successful deputy marshal is one of force of character, combined with sagacity, discretion, and judiciousness; briefly, a man of high standing in the community in which he holds office.

LIVING EXPENSES OF DEPUTY MARSHALS

The cost of living in Alaska, particularly in the isolated sections, is much higher than throughout the United States generally. The fact is recognized in your department by the allowances for the boarding of prisoners in certain sections of the Territory. The expense of furnishing indemnity bonds, although not a large item, should be considered in connection with the salaries of deputy marshals. I can not learn that such bonds are required of prohibition agents.

PER DIEM ALLOWANCES

All Government employees while traveling under the per diem allowance for maintenance enjoy a financial advantage over those who remain at their stations. Deputy marshals in Alaska are generally confined to their official stations and travel but little under per diem allowances. Prohibition agents are generally operating under per diem allowances in addition to their salaries.

DISPROPORTION OF SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES

After July 1, 1926, deputy marshals in Alaska will receive $6 per diem allowances while traveling. The salaries of these deputies who receive $5 or less per day are not in any sense proportionate to this per diem allowance.

That a deputy marshal whose duties call him to the seat of the court or to any place away from his home should receive more money to pay for food and lodging than he receives in salary when he is at home does not appear to be an equitable adjustment of salary and expenses.

DEPUTY MARSHALS SHOULD RECEIVE AT LEAST AS MUCH AS PROHIBITION AGENTS

I believe you will agree with me that for reasons set forth above the salary of a deputy United States marshal in Alaska should be as much as that of a prohibition agent.

I assume that the salaries for prohibition agents under the new organization plan were agreed upon after careful investigation regarding the cost of living and consideration of the type of men required for this work and their value to the public service. I am also assuming that the deputy marshals in Alaska, who are underpaid, are worthy of the same consideration that is given prohibition agents, and I therefore respectfully request that your department submit estimates for the next Budget that will enable you to pay fair salaries to your deputy marshals in Alaska.

A MINIMUM SALARY OF $2,400 PER YEAR

Deputy marshals in Alaska who receive salaries of $5 per day or less are paid much below the scale paid to mine laborers, cooks, teamsters, truck drivers, etc., in the placer-mining sections of the Territory, where the minimum wage for such employment is $5 and board per day. This is, in part, seasonal employment, but the same wage prevails for year-around employment.

In view of this fact and others set forth, I respectfully submit that a minimum salary of $2,400 per annum for deputy marshals is not one dollar more than they are entitled to.

THERE SHOULD BE NO UNNECESSARY ECONOMY IN LAW ENFORCEMENT

In these days of general demand for better enforcement of our laws, by reason of increase of crime, it appears to be a false economy that would hamper proper enforcement of law by the payment of inadequate salaries to enforcement officers.

If there is any department of this Government that should be supplied with sufficient funds to properly carry on its functions, that department is the one that administers the law.

Respectfully yours,

DAN SUTHERLAND,
Delegate from Alaska.

MAY 31, 1927.

Gen. HERBERT M. LORD,
Director Bureau of the Budget, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL LORD: I herewith inclose copy of a letter addressed to the Attorney General on the subject of salaries for deputy marshals in Alaska.

In this letter I have attempted to explain why an increase of salaries to these officials should be provided.

In discussing this subject with the general agent of the Department of Justice and his assistants on many occasions, I have gained the opinion that they were favorable to a better adjustment of salaries for deputy marshals, but felt compelled, by reason of instructions to economize in their estimates to the Bureau of the Budget, to make no change in this salary schedule.

May I not hope that this petition addressed to the Attorney General will receive your sympathetic consideration?

Sincerely yours,

DAN SUTHERLAND,
Delegate from Alaska.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, June 4, 1927.

Hon. DAN SUTHERLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SUTHERLAND: I have your letter of May 31, 1927, inclosing copy of a letter written by you to the Attorney General the same day in regard to the salaries of deputy marshals in Alaska.

In reply I have to advise that the appropriation for salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, for 1928, amounts to $3,650,000. The salaries paid from this amount, which is an increase of $250,000 over 1927, will be fixed by the Attorney General.

I am glad to receive the information which you have submitted in relation to this question, and assure you that the matter will be given careful attention when the estimates for 1929 are considered next fall.

Sincerely yours,

H. M. LORD, Director.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind the committee that the increase here is really $100,820. The $78,320 which we gave them last year through the deficiency bill was not available last year. So this is really an increase now of $100,820, which, to my mind, is sufficient.

Mr. LEAVITT. How much would that mean to each individual?

Mr. SHREVE. We do not appropriate the money to each individual. The appropriation is made in a lump sum and the increase is given to those who need it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BERGER) there were—ayes 16, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8267) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 6657. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River near Kettle Falls, Wash.; and

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution to continue commissioners in the Court of Claims.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made to-day on the strike situation and to insert a telegram that I referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I undertook to give to the House some information relative to the location of airways. There is a small map that covers the information, and I ask permission to insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. AYRES, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. HOCH), was given leave of absence for the day on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 10, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Senator-elect FRANK L. SMITH, of Illinois, before the special committee on expenditures in senatorial elections at its meeting on Saturday last.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HON. FRANK L. SMITH BEFORE THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN SENATORIAL ELECTIONS SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1928

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in deference to the notice from the chairman of this special committee I respectfully come before you to make a statement as briefly as the circumstances and the importance of the present matter affecting the people of Illinois and myself will admit.

For 110 years Ilinois has been a member of the Union of States which comprise our Nation. More than 7,000,000 people within her borders are directly concerned and affected by the denial of her constitutional right to full, equal, and continuous representation in the Senate of the United States. Her very motto embraces the theory of our dual form of government that was uppermost in the minds of the patriotic and farsighted men who framed our National Constitution, namely, "National Union! State sovereignty!"

Proudly Illinois has advanced through all the years since she was a loyal county of Virginia, later to become a Territory, and, finally, in 1818, to achieve her high and justly earned distinction of statehood in our National Union. Her history and traditions in support of constitutional government is as glorious as it has been constant and effective. She has never failed to maintain constitutional government and conform to its laws. Her sons have never failed to respond to the call of our country. In peace as in war, at home and abroad, a recital of more than a century of deeds accomplished and devotion unerring for the National Union is the glory of her people and commands the rightful admiration of her sister States.

The denial to Illinois of her inherent constitutional rights, which affects not only this State but, as she earnestly believes, the future welfare of the Nation, is of such grave importance that it makes this a solemn moment. Unimportant as may be my personality as one of the least of the factors in this far-reaching situation, I can not avoid, even if I willed it otherwise, to raise my voice in protest against such denial.

It has been said: "Let no man be sure that the injustice he to-day inflicts on another that to-morrow may not make of him the subject of the same injustice." This maxim applied to Illinois to-day may, and probably will, return again and again to plague other States of our Union.

Our Federal Constitution, as I understand it, provides that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years, and that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal representation in this body. It further provides certain qualifications for membership. No one shall be a Senator who shall be under 30 years of age or is nonresident of the State from which he is chosen. All powers not delegated to the National Government are reserved to the several States and to the people thereof.

The Senate is made the judge of the election of its own Members, and also of whether such Members possess the qualifications set forth in the Constitution. Every Senator upon assuming the duties of his office shall qualify by taking the oath to support the Constitution.

After its Members have been elected and qualified the Senate may punish any of them for disorderly conduct, and by a vote of two-thirds expel a Member therefor.

I feel justified in taking the position that whenever the State of Illinois, or any other sovereign State of this Union, sends to the National Senate its representative who bears the credentials of an uncontested and incontestable election, and possesses all the qualifications for that office that are set forth in the Constitution, that such State has the right to have such representative given the oath to membership.

Neither the Senate nor any nor all branches of the Federal Government has any right or authority to add anything to the qualifications as they are set forth in the fundamental law. If any such power exists it remains in the States or in the people thereof, and neither the States nor the people have yet seen fit to call it into being. Nowhere in the Constitution is the Senate authorized to select its own membership.

I come to this body bearing the credentials of the third State of the Union. I possess all the constitutional qualifications of a Senator. The fact of my election is beyond controversy. I was nominated as the Republican candidate for the office of Senator at a free and equal primary of the Republican voters of Illinois. Under the law of my State any question as to the integrity of my nomination could have been raised in the courts of each of the 102 counties of the State. No contest of any kind was ever instituted, and no suggestion has ever been made but that I was the choice of a large majority of the Republican voters of Illinois.

Between the primaries in April and the ensuing election held November 2, 1926, I was opposed by two able and vigorous candidates. The contest was spirited and even intense, and every charge of every kind and character that has ever been made against me anywhere was laid before the voters of my State, who have known me all my life. The event resulted in my election by a decisive vote. That result was canvassed by the State canvassing board, no contest was made or even threatened, and I was duly certified to the Senate of the United States as the uncontested choice of the electors of my State as one of its Senators.

Further, as indicative of the choice of the people of my State, there is of record here the joint resolution adopted by both houses of the General Assembly of Illinois insisting that her constitutional rights be respected and given effect by my admission to the office to which I was legally elected.

I am not unmindful that perhaps it might be politically expedient, so far as my individual fortune may be concerned, to assume to waive the constitutional rights of my State for the irregular opportunity of trying to convince the distinguished members of this special committee that the certificate of moral fitness, which the people of Illinois gave me in a general election, was merited. But if individual misfortune shall come by my act of refusing to sanction what I believe to be an unconstitutional proceeding, I shall all my life be comforted with the thought that if at some future time a denial of the rights of my State for the sake of political expediency shall be acquiesced in, it will be the act of someone other than myself. My State has honored me and has a right to expect in return, at whatever personal sacrifice may be the outcome, that I will stand firm in protest against the denial of her rights.

The framers of our Federal Constitution in an unamendable article guaranteed to each State equal representation in the United States Senate. It is my position that Illinois has been deprived of this guaranty.

The framers of the Federal Constitution provided that United States Senators should be elected by the various legislatures. Illinois was one of the first States to propose and affirm that this power should be lodged in the people. My credentials are, therefore, a mandate from the people of Illinois, as a result of a general election against which there never has been nor can there lie a charge of fraud or irregularity.

The people again spoke through their representatives in the adoption of resolutions creating the delegation on the constitutional rights of Illinois, which has appeared here. My position is supported by the choice and act of the people, by the act of the general assembly of my State, and by a unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois.

In volume 261, commencing at page 413, Illinois Supreme Court Reports, the Supreme Court of Illinois said:

"All persons are equally eligible to office who are not excluded by some constitutional or legal disqualification. * * * Eligibility to office, therefore, belongs equally to persons whomsoever not excluded by the constitution"—

And that—

"the legislature can not establish arbitrary exclusions from office or any general regulation requiring qualifications which the constitution has not required."

The court further says:

"There is a distinction between the office created by the constitution and those created by statute. Where an office is created by statute, it is wholly within the power of the legislature creating it. The length of term and mode of appointment may be altered at pleasure and the office may be abolished altogether."

But the court makes this important distinction:

"It is not so of constitutional office."

The court further reasons:

"It may be true that many persons having the constitutional qualifications are wholly unfit to discharge the duties of many offices within the State, but if the legislature possesses the power to vary the constitutional qualifications for office by adding new requirements or imposing additional limitations, then eligibility to office and freedom of elections depend not upon constitutional guaranties but upon legislative forbearance. If the legislature may alter the constitutional requirements, its power is unlimited, and only such persons may be elected to office as the legislature may permit. In our judgment, when the constitution undertakes to prescribe qualifications for office its declaration is conclusive of the whole matter, whether in affirmative or negative form. Eligibility to office belongs to all persons. In our constitution no other form of stating eligibility to office is found than the declaration that no person shall be eligible who does not possess certain qualifications. The Constitution of the United States is in the same form in this particular, and so are the constitutions of other States. The expression of the disabilities specified excludes others. The declaration in the constitution that certain persons are not eligible to office implies that all other persons are eligible."

My counsel advises that the Supreme Courts of California, Indiana, Maryland, Kansas, Minnesota, Montana, Texas, and Wisconsin have likewise consistently held concerning the power of a legislative body, which is that it may change qualifications for offices created by statute but can not change nor add to nor take from the qualifications named in the constitution.

In view of the action of the people of Illinois, by which they made me United States Senator, and in view of the act of the general assembly creating the delegation on the constitutional rights of Illinois in this matter, and, finally, in view of the interpretations of those constitutional rights by the Supreme Court of Illinois, I doubt whether even this special committee would expect me to depart from my plain duty in this instance by assuming to waive the rights of Illinois that I might participate in what the supreme court of my State has plainly said would be an extraconstitutional proceeding.

Thus I have been honored:

First. By the preference of my party at the primaries.

Second. By election at the hands of the people of my State.

Third. By executive appointment to fill a vacancy in the Senate.

Fourth. By the General Assembly of Illinois in resolutions adopted.

Fifth. By the demand of the senior Senator of Illinois.

Sixth. By the appearance in behalf of the State of the attorney general of Illinois.

Seventh. By interpretation of the Supreme Court of Illinois in support of my position to my right to membership in this body.

Under the circumstances now confronting me I can at this time do neither more nor less than to insist upon the sovereign rights of the State whose credentials I bear. That right is to have the candidate of her choice, who possesses all the constitutional qualifications, admitted to membership in this body, thereby according to my State the equal representation to which she is constitutionally entitled. When that right is granted, then I shall freely, gladly, and unafraid meet any and all charges respecting my moral or other fitness to continue a Member of this distinguished body. But unless and until the right of my State to such full, equal, and continuous representation is first accorded I can not become a party to an unwarranted precedent, nor to any pretended inquiry as to my personal fitness for association with the distinguished men now composing the Senate of the United States.

Great as my ambition to sit in the Senate may have been, and keen as my regret may be for the denial of my right to admission to this body, the duty I owe to the people who have honored me is the thing of highest importance in my life. To keep faith with this people is to me a greater thing than to be a Senator, and I shall keep faith with them, whatever the cost to myself shall be.

To keep faith with my people my course must be compatible with their rights. The people of Illinois know their rights under the Constitution. They know them by the unbroken practice of 150 years. They know them by the traditions which have been handed down from the founding of this Nation. They know them by the history of their country. They know their rights from that instinctive, inherent knowledge which tells all men in their souls whether they are bond or free.

The citizens of Illinois know that if they are a free people of a sovereign State they have the right, upon the day and in the manner prescribed by law, to choose of their own free will whomsoever they please to send as their representative to the Nation's Capital. They know that if they are restricted in this choice by the whim, the caprice, or even the conviction of any power on earth other than themselves that they are not free but are the bondsmen of tyranny.

I am here as their carefully considered and lawfully made choice for Senator. Therefore, in their name, and with full authority from my State and my people, I protest against any invasion of their rights, and demand that their choice of a Senator be respected, and that the Senate of the United States keep the faith of the Constitution which created it by giving to the representative of Illinois the seat justly due him.

If the Senate shall not comply with this demand; if it shall continue to deny to my State the right to have her representative administered the oath of office; and if it shall at last refuse to accord to the third State in the Union the equal representation guaranteed to it by the Constitution, I will have the consolation of knowing that Frank L. Smith refused to compromise the rights of those who have trusted and honored him, even though he might thereby have lost a seat in this august and historic assembly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present a letter from Mr. George Hannauer, president of the Boston & Maine Railroad, of Boston, Mass., which very concisely and clearly presents reasons why certain important changes should be made in the revenue bill now pending before the Committee on Finance of the Senate. I ask that this letter be treated in the nature of a petition, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON & MAINE RAILROAD,
Boston, Mass., January 6, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH:

* * * * * * *

I should like now to submit for your consideration in connection with the revenue bill (H. R. 1) which passed the House December 15, 1927, two provisions of special interest to the Boston & Maine Railroad, as well as to business corporations generally.

1. Section 13, which (we believe properly) reduced the corporation income tax from the existing rate of 13½ to 11½ per cent.

2. Section 141, which, except as to the taxable years 1927 and 1928, abolishes the present right of affiliated corporations to make consolidated returns.

1. The equity of the corporation-tax reduction is obvious when we consider:

A. That the normal tax upon individuals is only 1½, 3, or 5 per cent, and that while the net income of corporations distributed to stockholders is exempt from this normal tax, payments 12 per cent, 10½ per cent, or 8 per cent greater than would be made upon each dollar of net income earned by the individualistic or partnership form of business are made as a result merely of the use of the corporate business form.

2. Instead of eliminating the provisions for affiliated or consolidated returns, we believe these provisions should be made more generous.

Section 240 of the 1926 act provides: Two or more domestic corporations may be deemed to be affiliated—

(a) If one corporation owns at least 95 per cent of the stock of the other or others; or,

(b) If at least 95 per cent of the stock of two or more corporations is owned by the same interests.

(Stock as used in this requirement does not include nonvoting stock which is limited and preferred as to dividends.)

The object of the provision is set forth clearly in article 631 of regulations 69 under the heading affiliated corporations—

"Consolidated returns are based upon the principle of levying the tax according to the true net income of a single enterprise, even though the business is operated through more than one corporation. Where one corporation owns the capital stock of another corporation or other corporations, or where the stock of two or more corporations is owned by the same interests, a situation results which is closely analagous to that of a business maintaining one or more branch establishments. In the latter case, because of direct ownership of the property, the net income of the branch forms a part of the net income of the entire organization."

In other words, the theory of affiliation and the consolidated return is that of an "economic unit" with all intercompany transactions and relationships eliminated and a resulting balance sheet and profit and loss statement showing the situation as though it were a single business.

Provisions permitting or requiring consolidated returns have been placed in every revenue act since the 1917 act.

When the revenue bill of 1917 was before the Senate the Finance Committee reported:

"While the committee is convinced that the consolidated return tends to conserve, not to reduce, the revenue, the committee recommends its adoption not primarily because it operates to prevent evasion of taxes or because of its effect upon the revenue, but because of its effect upon the principle of taxing as a business unit, what in reality is a business unit, is sound and equitable and convenient both to the taxpayer and the Government."

If we admit this theory to be sound, manifestly the stipulation of ownership of 95 per cent of stock of an affiliated corporation is an arbitrary requirement. The true test should be the facts with respect to the economic unity.

Let us assume the case of a railroad owning 96 per cent of the stock of corporation A and 96 per cent of the stock of corporation B; in that event consolidation is permitted. The result is that if corporation A for the given year has a taxable income of $100,000; corporation B has a deficit of $200,000, and the parent company X has an income of $500,000, the taxable net income of the economic unit will be $400,000. But if the three companies are in fact one economic unit and X company is responsible for the deficits of A and/or B companies, why should an arbitrary 95 percentage of stock ownership be adopted; why 95 per cent or 51 per cent, or any other percentage? It would seem clearly that the test should be the fact as to economic unity alone.

Assume a parent corporation X which has guaranteed the principal and interest of all the outstanding bonds of corporation A. A minority stock ownership of A is in X. Yet in order to protect the bonds it is necessary for X annually to pay to A large operative deficits without hope of return. Is there not here also one economic unity?

These are some of the reasons why we believe that the provisions for consolidated returns should be reinstated in the new revenue act, and should be made more generous in order to reflect the true intent to tax an economic unit as such.

Respectfully,

GEORGE HANNAUER, President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented a petition of sundry citizens of Medfield, Mass., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ASHURST presented a resolution adopted by Cactus Chapter, No. 2, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, at Tucson, Ariz., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A resolution protesting against the enactment of any legislation which would defeat or nullify the Ashurst amendment to the World War veterans' act ($50 per month statutory award for arrested cases of service-connected tuberculosis)

Whereas it has come to the attention of the ex-service men's organizations throughout the United States that there are persistent rumors to the effect that the central office of the United States Veterans' Bureau intends to recommend to Congress a substantial reduction of the $50 per month statutory award for arrested cases of service-connected tuberculosis (Ashurst amendment); and

Whereas it has been shown that the statutory award of $50 per month for life for arrested tuberculars cost the disabled men and women of America untold energy to have enacted into a law, and this law did not become a reality until after our lawmaking bodies in Washington had been thoroughly convinced of its merits by the most expert and convincing evidence made possible by the highest skilled men in America; and

Whereas the Ashurst amendment has demonstrated the success of statutory award, inasmuch as a much smaller percentage of ex-service men have become reactivated since the inception of this law; and

Whereas the arguments of the United States Veterans' Bureau against this amendment and in favor of a graduated scale from 25 per cent to 33 per cent, according to the advancement of the disease, have been proven by medical and substantial facts to be both unfair and impracticable, due to the fact that nearly all cases of arrested tuberculosis which are service connected could not possibly be incipient cases at the bureau rating of 25 per cent, or they could not be moderately advanced, because if this were the case, according to bureau rulings, their disability could not be service connected; therefore they would not receive compensation. Therefore, the bureau must admit that practically only a few moderately advanced B and C class beneficiaries are receiving compensation, while the far-advanced cases are in the majority. For example, in United States Veterans' Hospital, No. 51, at Tucson, Ariz., there are at the present time approximately 38 beneficiaries receiving the rating of temporary total, 28 ex-service men receiving no compensation whatsoever, and 172 beneficiaries receiving a total permanent rating; and

Whereas the above figures prove beyond a doubt that the unfortunate men who are at present far-advanced cases, but who may some day be fortunate enough to become arrested cases have before them a poor financial outlook, should the bureau's ruling of 33 per cent for arrested far-advanced cases become a reality: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Cactus Chapter, No. 2, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Tucson, Ariz., in regular session assembled on the 5th day of January, 1928, do hereby protest against the enactment of any amendment by Congress which would defeat or nullify the Ashurst amendment to the World War veterans' act ($50 per month statutory award for arrested cases of service-connected tuberculosis); be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau; ROYAL C. JOHNSON, chairman of the Veterans' Committee in Congress; Commander Tate, of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War; Captain Kirby, national legislative committeeman of the D. A. V. W. W.; Hon. CARL HAYDEN; Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST; and I. A. Marcotte, the State commander of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

INVESTMENTS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution, which I ask may lie on the table so that I may call it up in a day or two, or whenever other important pending business of the Senate is disposed of, and discuss it at that time.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 7) was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the policy of this country with reference to investments and the conduct of trade by American citizens in foreign countries should be grounded upon the following principles:

1. American citizens engaged in trade or commerce in foreign countries must obey the laws of these countries.

2. Investments made by American citizens are subject to the laws of the country wherein they are made.

3. The Government of the United States will not assume responsibility for the fulfillment of contractual arrangements made by American citizens with foreign governments or with private citizens of foreign countries.

4. Before American citizens can expect the Government of the United States to take any action with reference to their complaints that they have been unfairly dealt with in foreign countries, they must first have exhausted the remedies available to them in the courts of such countries.

5. If, in the opinion of the President of the United States, decisions made by the court of last resort in any foreign country deny to American citizens the same rights accorded to nationals of other countries or violate the principles of international law, and also in the event that the legislative or executive branches of such foreign governments shall refuse to observe decisions of their courts favorable to American citizens, this country will endeavor to adjust such differences through friendly negotiations and stands ready to submit the same to arbitration.

6. In no event will the Government of the United States have recourse to arms or resort to force in any manner to gain or preserve for American citizens rights and privileges in any foreign country beyond those enjoyed by the native citizens of such country.

7. For the security of the Government of the United States, and to promote peace, the interests of the governments in this hemisphere are mutual. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the governments of the world to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend privileges and engage in conduct not permitted to the Government of the United States or its citizens under the foregoing declarations as dangerous to our peace and safety. We could not view any attempt on the part of a foreign government to encroach upon the rights of small nations and the equality of nations guaranteed to the countries of this hemisphere in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES

Mr. HARRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to state to the Senator from Mississippi that yesterday afternoon the Senate passed a resolution of mine directing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to continue the investigation heretofore made of naval oil leases. There are just a few words I want to say on that question, and I am wondering if the Senator from Mississippi will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I take it that it will not start any general discussion?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I can not guarantee that it will not.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska provided I can obtain the floor when he has concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the resolution which was passed yesterday directed that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys should continue the investigation heretofore made by that committee in reference to the leasing of public lands, and particularly of the naval oil reserves in Wyoming, and the committee is particularly directed to make an investigation as to the transactions and activities of the Continental Trading Co. of Canada and especially directed—to trace all the Government bonds held and dealt in by said corporation, with the purpose of ascertaining the beneficiary or beneficiaries of all the illegal transactions connected with the fraudulent and dishonest sale or leasing of the said naval oil reserves.

It occurred to me that for the benefit of the members of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys I ought to make at least a brief statement as to what has been shown by investigations made by the attorneys representing the Government in the trial of the lawsuit pending against Mr. Sinclair and former Secretary Fall.

In November, 1921, Mr. A. E. Humphreys, an oil producer of Texas, entered into negotiations with Harry F. Sinclair, H. M. Blackmer, James O'Neil, and Robert W. Stewart for the purpose of selling to them oil that he was producing from his oil wells in Texas. On November 15, 1921, at a conference with those men in New York City, Mr. Humphreys sold them more than 33,000,000 barrels of oil at the agreed price of $1.50 per barrel.

On the next day, when they met for the purpose of putting the contract in writing for the first time, these purchasers notified Mr. Humphreys that the real purchaser of the oil was the Continental Trading Co., of Canada, and asked that the contract be drawn in the name of that company.

Mr. Humphreys had never heard of the Continental Trading Co. and, because he knew nothing of its financial standing, he refused to enter into a contract for the sale of the oil to that company. Thereupon these men told Mr. Humphreys that they, on behalf of the companies which they represented, would guarantee the payment for the oil on behalf of the Continental Trading Co. The contract was then drawn in the name of the Continental Trading Co., and payment of the price of the oil by the said trading company was guaranteed by Sinclair, Blackmer, O'Neil, and Stewart.

At this time O'Neil was president of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co.; Stewart was chairman of the board of directors of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and still holds that position; Blackmer was chairman of the board of directors of the Midwest Refining Co., which was practically owned outright at that time, and still is, by the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana. Sinclair represented the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation. This corporation, together with the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana (represented by Stewart), jointly owned the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co.

On the next day, November 17, 1921, Henry Smith Osler, an attorney of Toronto, Canada, appeared upon the scene and executed the contract as president of the Continental Trading Co., while Sinclair and Stewart, "for the directors" of the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., and O'Neil, on behalf of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., signed the contract as guarantors.

On the same day this fraudulent Continental Trading Co. assigned its contract and resold the oil it had thus contracted to buy to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. and the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. jointly. This sale was made at a profit of 25 cents on each barrel.

By the terms of the contract from Humphreys to the Continental Trading Co. payments for oil deliveries were to be made on the 15th day of each month; and by the terms of the contract wherein the Continental Trading Co. resold the oil to the Stewart, Sinclair, and O'Neil corporations payments were to be made on the 10th day of each month. It was therefore possible for this fraudulent Continental Trading Co. to get its money from the real purchasers of the oil five days before it was required to make payments to the man who produced and sold the oil.

Under this contract oil was delivered by Mr. Humphreys and turned over to the Sinclair, Stewart, and O'Neil corporations until some time in May, 1923, when the Continental, through its president, Osler, assigned its interest in its contract to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. At this time there were still 25,000,000 barrels of oil to be delivered, and the profit of the Continental Trading Co., at 25 cents a barrel, on this remaining amount of oil would have been at least $6,250,000; yet Osler, on behalf of the Continental Trading Co., surrendered this contract to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. for $400,000.

Immediately this fraudulent Canadian company went out of business. The company was formed the day the contract was made. It never had any capital. It never had any property except the profit on this oil contract. It never did any business either before or since this oil transaction. When it went out of business it destroyed its records and all its documents. It is worthy of note that it went out of business about the time the Senate investigation of the Teapot Dome oil leases was threatened. While it was in business its profit of 25 cents a barrel on this oil amounted to $3,800,000. All of this money was deposited, under the direction of Osler, at the New York agency of the Dominion Bank of Canada and, under his direction, all of the money was invested in Liberty bonds of the United States Government. These bonds were, by this Dominion bank, then turned over to Osler.

In the trial of the Sinclair and Fall cases $230,000 of these bonds were traced to Mr. Fall. The balance of the bonds have never been accounted for; and the principal object in directing the committee to continue the investigation is to determine what became of the remainder of those bonds.

Upon the trial of the civil suit to recover Teapot Dome the Government counsel obtained a commission from the United States district court to take Osler's testimony in Canada When he was put on the stand he refused to testify on the ground that he was attorney for the Continental Trading Co. and its officials and that all the information he possessed was privileged. He was thereupon cited for contempt of court and on December 13, 1924, Justice Riddell, of the Supreme Court of Ontario, delivered judgment against him, ordering him to testify. Osler then appealed to the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario and a hearing was then had on the 11th of February, 1925; and on March 12, 1925, the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario rejected Osler's plea and ordered him to testify.

It may be worth while in passing to say that the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario passed on the question on the 12th of March, 1925, just 29 days after the matter had been submitted to it. I mention that to show how expeditious justice seems to be across the line as compared to the manner in which it is dragging along here for months at a time to find out whether or not somebody may be in contempt of court. In Canada the question went clear to the appellate division of the supreme court in less than 60 days and the court rendered a decision.

In the meantime, while this case was pending, Osler left Canada. After he had appealed from the court to the appellate court he left Canada and went to Egypt, it is alleged, on a lion hunt. It was therefore impossible to carry out the order of the court. He never returned until the case was disposed of, when his testimony, of course, would be of no value.

Also in the meantime Blackmer and O'Neil left the country and went to France. Senators will remember that they were the representatives of the oil corporations that really bought the oil and which had guaranteed the payment for the oil to Mr. Humphreys, the man in Texas who sold the oil. Of course, in view of the absence of Blackmer and O'Neil it was impossible for the Government to get their testimony. Stewart, who represented the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, also left the country and went to South America. Stewart came back later and said he did not know that they had been hunting him, as they had been all over the United States trying to get him on a subpœna; that he was down in South America on some oil business.

Blackmer and O'Neil are still in Europe and it is supposed that they will remain there perhaps for the balance of their lives, the Government, of course, being unable to get their testimony.

Both the Supreme Court of Ontario and the Supreme Court of the United States have branded the Continental Trading Co. as a corrupt and fraudulent instrumentality for the commencement of some illegitimate purpose. The Supreme Court of the United States said:

> The creation of the Continental Co., the purchase and resale of contracts enabling it to make more than $8,000,000 without capital, risk, or effort; the assignment of the contract to the resale purchasers at a small fraction of its probable value, and the purpose to conceal the disposition of its assets make it plain that the company was created for some illegitimate purpose. * * *
> The record shows * * * that the Government, notwithstanding the diligence reasonably to be expected, was unable to obtain the testimony of Blackmer, O'Neil, Stewart, Everhart, or Osler in respect of the transaction by which the Liberty bonds recently acquired by the Continental Co. were given to and used by Fall. * * *

Mr. President, I will not take the time to read it, but I should like to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which calls attention, it seems to me, to several important items.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana is involved in this transaction. If in this deal, which was made in New York, the representatives of these oil companies who bought oil of Humphreys themselves and then used this trading company to transfer it to their company were honest and really bought it, they were cheating their own companies, and the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana was one of the victims as well as the Sinclair company and O'Neil company. In other words, the officials of these companies were buying oil at $1.50 a barrel and selling it to their own companies at $1.75 a barrel, and they were using this fraudulent corporation as a go-between to make the transfer. So that the stockholders of each one of these companies, assuming that this transaction had not some other ulterior purpose, were being robbed by their officials, and among the number comes the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, owned to a great extent, I am informed, by Mr. Rockefeller and the Rockefeller Foundation.

I have a letter written to me by Mr. Green, of Chicago, Ill., referring to that, and I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

CHICAGO, December 1, 1927.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In these times when such unconscionable efforts are being made to shield the criminals in the Teapot Dome oil case and make it appear that it is the officials of this Government who are the ones responsible for jury tampering, is it not well to consider that the interests which would have been the most benefited had our Government been unsuccessful in recovering its own property are the ones who are supplying the funds to protect the oil criminals in this country as well as paying others to remain away from the country?

The decision of the Supreme Court links together in a chain of evidence that can not be broken the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, with the Sinclair company in their united attempt to rob the Nation of its Teapot Dome deposits of oil set aside by Congress for the defense of this country.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has authoritatively proclaimed through its advertisements that the Rockefeller Foundation is the largest stockholder in the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and that the three largest influences in that company are the Rockefeller Foundation, the employees, and the General Education Board.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court declares that the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation own, share and share alike, the Sinclair Pipe Line Co. and the Sinclair Oil Purchasing Co. and that the performance with the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, which was created for some illegitimate purpose, was guaranteed by Robert W. Stewart, chairman of the board of directors of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and Sinclair, chairman of the board of directors of the Sinclair oil organization.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court also cites the departure from this country for Europe in 1924 of H. M. Blackmer, of the Midwest Refining Co., a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and James O'Neil, of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., and the absence from American jurisdiction of Robert W. Stewart, of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, at the time of the trial of the case in Cheyenne, Wyo.

The Rockefeller Foundation professes to be an organization established with the chartered purpose to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world, and that its charter is a pledge of limitless faith in the power of progress, in the triumph of good over evil, of education over ignorance, of brotherly love over selfishness.

And yet in the face of these sublime sentiments the Rockefeller Foundation, with John D. Rockefeller, jr., the chairman of its board of trustees, seems never to have made an effort to have the industrial organization which it controls restore the Teapot Dome deposits of oil to this Government, where they belong, but rather have the officials of the foundation, by their inaction and apathy, invited a suspicion that they hoped the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and its confederate might be able to retain the spoil of their attempted banditry and that it is disappointed at the result.

What a deplorable case of covetous greed and hypocrisy, of corruption, collusion and fraud, of disloyalty to this country has been exposed by the United States Supreme Court.

Why should not John D. Rockefeller, jr., chairman of the board of directors, and George E. Vincent, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, be subpœnaed by the Government or the Senate committee and be questioned regarding the disposition of the $8,000,000 transaction in the Continental Oil deal and the scandalous activities of Stewart and other subordinate officials in the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the control of which appears to be vested in the Rockefeller Foundation, the Rockefeller Educational Bureau, and the employees of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana? Why prosecute the tools and dummies and let the principals behind the scene remain unmolested?

Yours very truly,

A. W. GREEN,
7½ Board of Trade, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I believe that is all I have to say, and I am much obliged to the Senator from Mississippi for yielding to me.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 52) submitted by Mr. MCMASTER, favoring a reduction of tariff schedules and the consideration of tariff legislation at the present session of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it was a pitiable spectacle yesterday to see the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] standing in his accustomed place speaking in behalf of the protected interests of this country and trying to defend the nefarious provisions of the present tariff law. It drew even from my warm-hearted Democratic breast some sympathy for the distinguished Senator, because all through his address his former fellow conspirators in crime deserted him and he took refuge by reading to the Senate resolutions which had been adopted by the United States Chamber of Commerce, composed in large measure of distinguished bankers and manufacturers of the country, which resolutions expressed views contrary to his, even going to the extent of saying that the tariff should be revised so that agriculture might be lifted and be placed upon an equality or at least a partial equality with the manufacturing industry. Then he took occasion to criticize the American delegation to the Economic Conference at Geneva because their work was contrary to his views touching this matter. He stood there forlorn, though, defending the old bill and old system, like the boy who stood upon the burning deck, "whence all but him had fled."

I am sorry that the distinguished Senator from Utah is not now in the Chamber. He probably will wend his way in in a moment. He took umbrage at the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER] yesterday because the Senator from South Dakota left the Senate Chamber for about 10 minutes during that four-hour speech. He forgot that about the only person who did listen to all of the speech happened to be in the galleries and went crazy during the discourse. The poor fellow even yelled "Murder." But the Senator probably will return in a moment. It was perfectly natural that he should have read from the message of the President of the United States both to the Chicago congress and to the American Congress as to the importations of agricultural products and the benefits that agriculture received from this system.

The distinguished Senator from Utah, when he has a lucid interval, is sometimes right; but the trouble is that he does not stand long enough in one place. I recall, and other Senators recall, that last fall we read in the papers that the distinguished Senator from Utah visited Washington and gave out to the press a statement in which he said that the American people were entitled to share in these large surpluses that had been accumulated from the exactions of the Government from the taxpayers of the country, and that he would exercise his high position as chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate in seeing to it when the Congress convened that they should be given immediate tax reduction, and the reduction would be higher than the amount that Mr. Mellon had said the Treasury would stand; that he was in favor of going higher than any $250,000,000.

We had some hope then that perhaps we would get some relief from these burdens of direct taxes; but some weeks after that the Senator again visited the Secretary of the Treasury, and he had a confab with him, and he came out and gave to the press another statement in which he said, "No; we can not pass a bill carrying a larger amount of reduction than that recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. We must confine our work in tax reduction to $250,000,000." He still held to the view, however, that this surplus had been piled up through the exactions of the Government from the taxpayers, and that immediate tax reforms should be entered upon by the American Congress when we convened in December.

The Senator, however, is still on speaking terms with the Secretary of the Treasury; and the other day he had another conference with him. Then he came out and said that now the Secretary and he are agreed that there should be no tax reduction until after the 15th of March; and this morning I read with amazement in the papers that this same distinguished leader says that they have the votes in the Finance Committee to prevent the Democrats from bringing it out and giving an immediate reduction to the American taxpayer; so he is rather inconsistent in his position. Little wonder that yesterday he, and he alone, would speak a word in defense of the duties written in behalf of the Aluminum Trust. Mr. Mellon, you know, and his family dominate that suffering concern.

Mr. President, "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again." Facts will tell. It was a beautiful and a roseate setting that you gentlemen over there constructed in 1921, when you steered to passage the emergency tariff bill. All the ills of the farmer were to be cured in the pages of that law. No longer was depression to confront him. No longer were hardships to handicap him and adversity to advance upon him. The cure had been found, and the remedy was to be applied, and through its soothing application all irritation was to be removed, and a recurrence of the disease made impossible.

Ah, what a beautiful rainbow, with all the radiant colors, did you stretch across the heavens presaging hope to the American farmer! Through the duties in that bill you made beds throughout the fields of agriculture that the farmer might rest his weary head and recline his tired body. His fields were to became verdant with plenty, and his prices were to soar to high heaven. To the farmer the old moon seemed to shine more softly and the sun more gently. In your work at that time, however, you were only applying an anesthetic to him that you might perform a major operation on him in the next Congress, when you intended, and you did, to pile higher tariff duties against him and for the protected manufacturers of the country.

But the farmer soon came out of his coma. He soon saw that a job was being put up on him. The man in the moon began to wink his eye, and the old sun got angry and hot under the collar. He saw the rainbow of hope and anticipation disappear and fade from his view. Those roseate beds upon which he laid down to rest his tired and depressed body soon became hard and uncomfortable. The trap that you had prepared had entrapped yourselves. Those wonderful fields, so verdant with promise, that you told him about began to grow up with the weeds of retaliation, cockleburs of entanglements, and the thistles that pricked him on every side. It was not long, sirs, until the skies became overcast—at first clouds no larger than the hand made their appearance and day by day they have enlarged, until now a storm threatens and a downpour of condemnation awaits you in the coming election. The trap you fixed has entrapped you. The gun you loaded has recoiled upon you.

The farmer sees now, as never before, what the iniquitous protective-tariff system, with all its discriminating influences, does for him. He understands now, as never before, that you can not through artificial measures give protection to this and that and work equality to all the industries of America. It will not do. Too much depends upon the consideration. The farmers of the country can not compete with the bloated special interests. Then, too, the law of economics will not permit it. Long have those who believed as I believe prophesied that the time would come under such a system when the purchasing power of those highly protected industries would soar high, while that of agriculture would decline until the difference would become apparent to everyone. And yet my friend from Utah on yesterday said that there was no difference between the farmer's dollar and the manufacturer's dollar! He really believes that. Why, he said that talking about differences in exchanging of the product of the farmer for those things that the manufacturer produces was out of the question.

Before I finish I expect to show the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar when compared to the manufacturer's dollar, and how small is that which may be received by the farmer when he takes his products to the market and exchanges them for some of the things that it is necessary for him to buy.

What do the facts show? And when I talk to-day I am not talking along Democratic principles. I know there are men on the other side of the aisle who believe just as strongly as I do that this system of protection has enriched one class while it has pauperized another class. I know of no legislation that has been presented to the American Congress that I regretted being unable support more than the legislation proposed by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], known as the McNary-Haugen bill. I wanted to support anything that might help the farmers; and unless this system can be changed by the American representatives as it is now upon the statute books, I do not know, my friends, but that I shall vote for the proposition. I was against it because I was afraid it might perpetuate this iniquitous tariff system upon the country. Of course, the tariff was not written into its pages, but it was the tariff that made it possible for you to lift the prices as you sought to do.

While I could not support that measure, I welcome the resolution of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER]. I believe much support for it will come from the other side, because I know how truly those who are working with the Senator for the passage of the resolution represent the wishes of that great section of the country that has seen its purchasing power go down while that of the manufacturers of the country has gradually climbed higher. I am not so much interested in the particular wording of the resolution. If you want to change it so as to stand for revision of the tariff downward from the general tariff levels now upon the statute books, that is all right; but if you want to leave it as it is, for the lowering of tariff duties, it meets my viewpoint.

I know that the Senator from South Dakota did not intend by his resolution to favor the lowering of the tariff duties on every article. He was only striking at the whole tariff system as it is now on the statute books, and he wanted the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate so to draft it as to carry out the general idea of a tariff revision downward. To put it merely "tariff revision" would not suffice, because I recall, and you recall, that in one of the memorable campaigns in this country a distinguished candidate for President who now adorns the Supreme Court of the United States said, following the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, that he construed "revision" not to mean "downward" but "upward."

But, Mr. President, let us look at the cold facts in this situation. Let us analyze the ad valorem duties upon these agricultural products that were placed in the emergency tariff and incorporated in the main in the general tariff law, and then see how they compare with the ad valorem rates carried on many of the things that the farmer buys.

Mr. President, I do not assume that the rates on agriculture in the present law protect agriculture. I believe that the whole scheme was a delusion and a snare. I knew, when it was written, that it would not work. The distinguished gentlemen over there who sponsored the measure and who sit before me now knew it would not work; but they were willing to offer the sop to the farmers of the Middle West and the West in the hope that they might continue to keep them within the folds of Republicanism.

My friend from Indiana, Senator WATSON——

Mr. WATSON rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to him.

Mr. WATSON. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the agricultural schedules of the present tariff law were largely framed by the heads of the Agricultural Department as represented in the city of Washington, and that after they had been formulated they were carried to those heads and approved practically without a single dissenting voice on any one of the items involved?

Mr. HARRISON. That does not contradict anything I have said, may I say to the Senator, and I hope he will just restrain himself a little while and give me the benefit of his smiling countenance, and I shall convince him that it does not have any effect upon me.

Mr. WATSON. No; I imagine not.

Mr. HARRISON. Not a bit in the world. I believe in certain principles, and because some one else takes the opposite view it does not change my allegiance to those principles. I am going to read to the Senate the differences and compare the rates on agricultural products which the Senator and his colleagues imposed with the ad valorem rates on manufactured products. I said that that was a paper comparison. That does not mean an actual comparison, because it is impossible to compare them. The Senator from Indiana knows that it makes no difference what tariff duties you may impose upon cotton of the short-staple variety, it could not possibly affect the price of it.

The Senator and his colleagues know that distinguished leaders of the Republican Party have always said that the tariff on wheat did not affect the price of wheat. Let me read for the Senator's edification, that the RECORD may still contain them, some expressions of some very distinguished leaders of his party who have made that contention, although you placed this high duty upon wheat and the President, in his generosity and his ambition at the time—because then he chose to run again—still lifted the price of wheat. But, unfortunately, from that time on in most instances the price of wheat on quotations in Winnipeg has been higher than either at Minneapolis or Chicago.

The Senator does not contradict that proposition. For nine days after the emergency tariff law had been signed by the President wheat went down 9 cents a bushel. Yet they tried to make the farmers of the great Northwest believe that they were going to cure all their ills.

I do not know how to get along without my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in his seat. He was on a commission back in 1907, a commission appointed to investigate this whole agricultural situation from the standpoint of the tariff. He served on that commission with the late distinguished leader of the majority side of the Senate, Senator Lodge, and other distinguished Republicans. Also on that commission was the last chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate before the Senator from Utah, Senator McCumber.

These are the men who made up that commission in 1907: Senator Gallinger, Senator Lodge, Senator Crawford, of South Dakota, Senator SMOOT, of Utah, and Senator McCumber, of North Dakota. They said in their report:

> The tariff on the farmer's products, such as wheat, corn, rye, barley, cattle, and other livestock, did not and could not in any way affect the prices of these products.

My friend from Utah can read that in the RECORD to-morrow. Our late friend, the distinguished Senator from Iowa, Mr. Cummins, stated, in answer to a question, that he did not believe that the tariff affected the price of wheat, and said:

> It is idle for even an enthusiast to assert that the price of these products is directly affected by the protective tariff.

Mr. Bristow, then a Senator from the State of the next Republican nominee for President—not even that suggestion awakes the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] from his slumbers—said:

> We raise far more wheat, corn, cattle, and hogs than we consume, and the result is that the farmer can not be protected by a tariff because the price of his produce is fixed by the world market.

Senator Nelson, of Minnesota, expressed this view in reference to the matter:

> I do not recall the millions of bushels produced in the State of Minnesota, but I desire to tell the Senator that the tariff on wheat, which is on the statute books, has not done us a particle of good. It would be like a tariff on cotton, because up to this time we have been exporting from 150,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. The price of our wheat is fixed by the Liverpool price—the export price—and no duty up to this time has helped us.

The fact is, Mr. President, that only on one kind of wheat—that is, No. 1 northern spring wheat—can the tariff duty have any effect at all. That particular kind of wheat, experts tell us, is mixed with other kinds of wheat in the making of certain kinds of flour, and to some extent that grade is imported, when there is not enough of that grade of wheat in the Dakotas, in Minnesota, perhaps, and in Montana; but that is only a small percentage of the great bulk of wheat in this country.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Do I understand the Senator, then, from his argument, to take the position that we should at once repeal the tariff duties on all agricultural products?

Mr. HARRISON. I did not say that. The Senator certainly did not understand me to say that.

Mr. WATSON. If the tariff is of no earthly avail, and does not help in any respect, or one particle, why have it?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator did not rise to contradict what these distinguished Senators said with reference to this matter.

Mr. WATSON. I am not interested in that. That was 18 years ago. I am interested in the Senator. What does he think?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator should accept their views. They were, and some of them still are, leaders of his party. I would so adjust the tariff rates, if I could write a bill, that if of this particular kind of wheat there was some imported into this country, and we could raise some revenue and could lift it to a competitive basis—and we could—I would put a tariff on that particular kind. I would look with the greatest particular favor on the products of the farmer that could possibly be benefited by the tariff, so that I could help to lift the farmer's products to a parity with the protected products of the manufacturers of this country. The Senator knows I am trying to show to him that these paper rates on agricultural products are merely on paper, and do not, practically speaking, bring the benefits he talks about.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator yield for another interruption?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. WATSON. The last Democratic revenue tariff law passed—the Underwood-Simmons law—gave practical free trade on all agricultural products, and in one year thereafter there was brought into the United States a total of agricultural products of $350,000,000, in that single year, more than in the whole four years under the preceding tariff administration. Does the Senator hold that that was for the good of agriculture in the United States?

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble about the Senator is that his mind has been on other propositions and he has not looked at the facts lately. He is a little wrong on the facts, and I am going to give them to him before I have finished with that particular proposition.

Mr. WATSON. I will be very glad to have them.

Mr. HARRISON. So far as wheat is concerned, I have stated the situation. Let us take corn, on which they put their tariff rate. We raise in this country over 2,000,000,000 bushels and import into it about 1,000,000 bushels a year. We export ten times as much corn as we import. No one can contend that the tariff on corn helps the corn farmers of this country.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. The only kind of corn that is imported is some that comes to the Pacific coast, of a character that is not produced in this country. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we produced very nearly 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn last year. In 1926 we imported 1,055,000 bushels.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator for the correction.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And that corn that is imported, I would like to state to the Senator, is imported for chicken feed, because it is of a small kernel, coming from Argentina.

Mr. HARRISON. And we exported many times more than we imported of corn in this country. So you can take these duties placed upon agricultural products in the most instances and you will find they are not effective at all.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The American Farm Federation has just presented the case for an increase of the tariff on corn.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not surprised at that. It is made up of Republicans for the most part.

Mr. FESS. The American Farm Federation?

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator said the Tariff Commission.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no; it is the American Farm Federation.

Mr. HARRISON. I think they are wrong, that is all. Does not the Senator think they are wrong about it?

Mr. FESS. The Senator does not think they are wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not? He thinks that where we produce 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn in the United States and import a million bushels, and when we export billions, we still ought to have a tariff on corn, that it helps somebody? That is his idea of the proposition? When for me it does not make any difference. The tariff on corn is ineffective one way or the other.

Mr. President, in the ad valorem rates upon these products corn got a 16 per cent ad valorem duty, hogs about 5 per cent, cattle 32½ per cent, wheat 31 per cent, potatoes 22 per cent, oats 31 per cent, apples 12½ per cent, barley 27 per cent, rye 14 per cent, and on down the line. Let me read, in comparison with those paper duties, the ad valorem rates upon some manufactured products. Let us see how they compare.

Woolen manufactures: The ad valorem is 61 per cent.

Cotton manufactures: The ad valorem is 47 per cent.

Silk manufactures: The ad valorem is 60 per cent.

Metals: The ad valorem is 49 per cent.

Pottery and earthenware: The ad valorem is 60 per cent.

Those are some of the things that the farmer buys, carrying these high ad valorem rates, from 50 to 60 per cent, and more, while your little paper rates on agricultural products range down as low as 5 per cent ad valorem.

That is not all, Mr. President. Here are some of the increases in the present law that affect the agricultural interests of this country. The factory value of chemicals in this country is approximately $630,000,000. Chemicals are a serious cost factor in textiles, leather, steel, and other industries, yet most of the rates on acids are practically prohibitive, and such articles as potassium compounds, sodium compounds, flavoring extracts, lead compounds, and calciums, are so heavily taxed that approximately only $20,000,000 worth subject to duties under the chemical schedule are imported annually. While paints and colors and pigments carry duties averaging as high as 32 per cent, and the factory value of the domestic output approximates $400,000,000 annually, we import only about two and a half million dollars' worth annually. Our exports range around $15,000,000 of that item alone.

Soap is taxed 30 per cent, with a value of production in the United States approximating $300,000,000 annually. Seven and a half million dollars' worth only is exported annually, and the tariff is so high as to permit $550,000 worth of importations annually.

Iron and steel products: The distinguished Senator from Utah told the Senator from South Dakota yesterday that he could not point out anything that cost the farmer more by virtue of this proposition. Iron and steel products are a large cost factor in practically every industry in America. Coal and iron are the two great basic commodities which underlie all industry. In the face of these facts we now find the tariff restored on pig iron, steel rails, and all the alloys, and most other materials. Although the United States produces 60 per cent of the world's pig iron and steel, the new tariff on pig iron and iron in slabs and blooms was raised to as much as 36 per cent. I shall not continue down the line. The iron and steel schedule shows imports of $26,000,000 and revenues of only $7,500,000 annually.

There is an average ad valorem tariff duty of 29 per cent on these items, yet the total exports of steel and iron products is $221,000,000 annually, and the value of iron and steel products in the United States is $7,000,000,000. Every product that the farmer buys into which iron or steel enters is increased in cost to the farmer by virtue of the rates imposed under this law.

Let us take earthenware. The farmers buy that. Duties were heaped on the crude materials from which earthenware is made, such as magnesite and graphite, and they were taken from the free list and placed upon the dutiable list, making earthenware cost more to the American farmer in every product made from that particular material.

Glass and glass products were increased, affecting the cost of every article in which glass enters. Every goblet and pane of glass the farmer buys is increased in price by virtue of the tariff. The great automobile industry of the country needs glass, and every time we increase the price of glass to them we increase the cost of the automobile to the American farmer and to every automobile user in the country.

Sixty-two million dollars' worth of jute bagging and cordage and manufactured flax and hemp was imported to this country. These articles were taken from the free list.

In the matter of linoleum, some farmers like to have linoleum to put upon the floor in their kitchen or their dining room, or maybe even in their parlor or sitting room, and yet there was a high tariff put on linoleum when the domestic production of it is $52,000,000 annually.

In the matter of silk manufactures, of course, those gentlemen who wrote this law do not believe that a farmer's wife should have anything made out of silk, that that sort of thing must be left to those who are more fortunately protected in the great manufacturing interests of the country. The importations of silk manufactures were $36,000,000, notwithstanding the great increase in silk consumption in the United States. The principal silk fabric comprising silk manufactures comes in at 55 and 60 per cent ad valorem. Importations of silk wearing apparel were only $8,000,000 annually. The factory value of silk in this country is $800,000,000. It is manifest that this great class of luxuries, retailing at $1,000,000,000 to $1,250,000,000 annually, should pay more than $17,000,000 in revenue to the Government.

These are some of the things that make the task of the farmer hard; that make his cost of living high. Ah, but the President of the United States, as quoted yesterday by the Senator from Utah, said that over $780,000,000 of importations into this country affected the farmer, that duties upon dutiable farm products amounting to $780,000,000 worth came into this country that go to benefit the American farmer. What does he include in that list? Among other things he included sugar. Sugar! One man on the Tariff Commission was practically discharged and sent as minister to Rumania because he stood for a reduction of the exorbitant rates on sugar. If there is one thing that is costing the American people millions and millions of dollars it is the high rates on sugar. There are certain products which are raised by the farmer which, when they are imported into this country, benefit the farmer to the amount of the tariff that is imposed. Sugar is one of those propositions, but it does not benefit all the farmers. It does not benefit the cotton farmer, and there are some 12,000,000 of them. It does not benefit some 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 of wheat farmers in the country. They all buy sugar. It does not benefit the tobacco growers, who are farmers. It does not benefit the corn farmers, and there are some 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 of those in this country. But the 150,000, or possibly a few more, of sugar producers, either of sugar cane or sugar beets, are benefited to the extent of the tariff imposed on sugar.

And so when the President was talking about these large amounts of importations in agricultural products he included tobacco, sugar, and wool. What a very small percentage of the American farmers are interested in wool. Every time a tariff rate on wool is raised, it naturally causes the price of those things from which wool is made to be raised to those farmers who are not producing wool. The same is true of sugar. So far as the tobacco farmer is concerned, he is very small in number, there being not over 150,000 who raise tobacco. Those who are reporting the raising of tobacco are engaged in the production of other products.

So the large importations of which President Coolidge spoke as amounting to $780,000,000, in which the farmer is interested and by which he said the farmer is benefited, do not really benefit him. If he would segregate the small number benefited by the sugar tariff, if he would segregate the small number benefited by the tobacco tariff, he would see the inequality of the proposition compared to the great number of cotton farmers in the country whose products increase in price by virtue of those rates, and the great number of wheat farmers in the country whose products are increased by those rates, and the 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 of people interested in corn production in the country who must pay the higher prices for those products. And as to the tobacco farmers, they get no protection from the duties on tobacco. The only kind of tobacco imported are the kinds not raised in this country. Our own tobacco growers have a monopoly on our home market.

Yesterday the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said if we would lower the tariff 10 per cent on everything it would affect the revenues of the Government. Mr. President, there are certain products imported into this country which, I do not care how high may be the duty placed upon them, have no effect. If we placed a duty of a dollar a pound on short-staple cotton, we could not affect the price of cotton. We look to the markets of the world to sell our surplus cotton. If we placed a duty of a dollar a bushel upon wheat, only when we had a depressed condition in Montana and in the Dakotas, when the farmers of that section failed to produce a sufficient amount of No. 1 northern spring wheat and an adequate surplus of it could be had in Canada, would it affect in the slightest the price of wheat in this country? If we put a duty of a dollar a bushel upon corn, we could not possibly affect the price of corn. The same is true of hay, rye, and similar products. It is not so true with reference to rice, because we import some rice and wherever we import a product and lay a duty upon it, it does to some extent incidentally give some protection to the producers of that particular product. But the number of rice farmers is only 11,476 in the whole United States.

Mr. President, I submit, under the rates which I have read, carried in the present law on the manufactured goods of this country, comparing them with the small paper protection that is given to agriculture, that there can not be an equilibrium established between those two great industries. If it is maintained long the farmer can do nothing except to leave his farm, go out of the farming business, with all the consequences that will inevitably follow from such a condition.

The distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on yesterday—and it was hinted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] a moment ago—spoke of the large amount of importations coming into this country in 1920 and 1921. The Senators forgot to state that there were very large increases in exportations during those times. It is quite true that importations in 1921 over 1920 showed an increase of $619,000,000. That is true. But, Mr. President, the amount of increased importations was in raw materials which came in at that time. The amount of increase in manufactured products which came in during 1921 over 1920 was only $44,000,000, and during the year the Senator spoke of we exported $1,000,000,000 more of manufactured products that we imported into the United States. If the Senator will take into consideration what Mr. Hoover said in his reports on two occasions, that the increased importations "were due to the advanced prices at that time," he would have a different idea about the situation. The Senator knows, though he might not rise in his place in the Senate and say it, that a dollar before the war bought more than it did in 1920 or to-day. So the value of things are higher. So if we take the value of importations before the war and compare them with 1920 and 1921, we find there is practically no difference in the amount of importations into this country.

Talk about importations! That is not the key to the situation. The success of the tariff system is revealed in the balance of trade which is shown between the exportations and the importations into this country. Give us a tariff system that will bring $2,000,000,000 worth of gold into this country annually over one that only shows a difference of $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 between exportations and importations.

The success of the system which the Senator from Utah has perpetrated on the country has been mentioned. Mr. President, I want to read to him from the reports showing that under his system this law has not worked so beautifully in the interest of this country.

Take the year 1923. The Republican majority had placed this law upon the statute books, and yet what were the exportations and importations of agricultural products during that year? To hear the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] speak one would certainly think that under the benign influence of this system the exportations of agricultural products were more than the importations into this country, and yet what are the facts? Let me drill them into the minds of Senators on the other side of the Chamber. In 1923 the exports of agricultural products were $1,799,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. Is the Senator referring to the fiscal year or the calendar year?

Mr. HARRISON. To the fiscal year.

Mr. WATSON. The year beginning with June, 1923?

Mr. HARRISON. I am referring to the fiscal year 1923. These figures I am quoting were furnished me by one of the authorized agencies of the Government.

Mr. WATSON. Are the figures for the year beginning June 30, 1922, or June 30, 1923?

Mr. HARRISON. I think on reflection that these figures are for the calendar year 1923, but I do not care whether they are for the calendar year or the fiscal year. The Senator from Indiana is employing his usual talent when he is driven to the wall of trying to confuse the issue.

Mr. WATSON. The only difference is——

Mr. HARRISON. Whether the figures are for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July, 1922, or on the 1st of July, 1923, or for the calendar year beginning on the 1st of January, 1922, or the 1st of January, 1923, I do not care.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, the Senator would not care——

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. WATSON. Because he is not paying much attention to the facts; but what I am trying to get into the Senator's mind——

Mr. HARRISON. The difficulty is that I get my figures from one of the authorized agencies of the Government, while the Senator from Indiana takes his figures from his own head. That is the reason that I am usually right and he is always wrong.

Mr. WATSON. May I say to the Senator from Mississippi something I have got in my head that I want to transfer to his?

Mr. HARRISON. Very well; I hope the Senator will "shoot" it.

Mr. WATSON. I shall be very glad to do so. The Senator from Mississippi is reading from figures for the fiscal year beginning on the 30th of June, 1922, and running to the 30th of June, 1923. Three months of that time were under the Underwood Tariff Act, because the Fordney-McCumber tariff law did not go into effect until the latter part of September, 1923. Not only that, but if the Senator from Mississippi will look into the history of all tariff acts he will find that before the new tariff rates go into effect there are always large importations, because people rush in to take advantage of the low tariff before the high rates are imposed. That is the universal history of tariff making in the United States, and that will account in part for the large importations to which the Senator calls attention.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator from Indiana finished?

Mr. WATSON. I have.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, I am not going to give the figures for 1923. Let us take the year 1926. I think the present tariff law was in force then. How will that suit the Senator?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; it was.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, let us see about those figures. The exportations of agricultural products in 1926 amounted to $1,891,000,000, while the importations were $1,918,000,000—practically $50,000,000 more of imports than of exports of agricultural products. Has the Senator from Indiana anything to say now?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly I have.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I knew the Senator would have.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly I have. I have to say, in the first place, that I understand the Senator's argument to be that the tariff on agricultural products is wholly ineffective and can not be made effective; and, in the second place, if the imports are interfering with American agriculture and an increase of those rates would make the tariff effective, then we ought to impose higher rates. I want to say to my friend that I am one of those who believe that wherein tariff is ineffective, if we can not make it effective as to agricultural products by the imposition of increased rates, then we should buttress the tariff by some such measure as the McNary-Haugen bill, so as to make those rates effective as to agricultural products, because I will ask my friend if he does not concede—and I understood him to say a while ago that he intended to support the McNary-Haugen bill——

Mr. HARRISON. I said if the Republican majority continued to carry on their nefarious practice of keeping present tariff rates in force, to the great disadvantage of agriculture, I might be forced to accept that proposition.

Mr. WATSON. There are a great many things I might say about that.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. For instance, I will digress long enough to ask if the Senator from Mississippi did not vote against the imposition of every one of the agricultural rates which the tariff law imposes?

Mr. HARRISON. I opposed the emergency tariff bill, and with my small ability, but more enthusiasm, I likewise opposed the indefensible rates carried in the McCumber tariff law.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator opposed that?

Mr. HARRISON. I stood upon this floor for three weeks and opposed it for this reason, may I say to the Senator: I knew that he was applying the first dose to the farmers of the country so that he might perpetuate the obnoxious protective tariff system upon the country. I knew that when the Republican Party had succeeded in imposing these duties upon agricultural commodities, duties which the Senator said in many instances were but a sham and a fraud and he did not believe they would work——

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; I said no such thing.

Mr. HARRISON. They had it in mind to come along with a major operation and give to the manufacturers a thousand per cent more protection than was given to the farmers. My position about that matter has always been consistent, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has always been absolutely consistent.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Mississippi is the one free trader that I know in this body——

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator can not properly say that.

Mr. WATSON. I mean by that that the Senator is the one man——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has made this political speech so often that he is in the habit of saying that anyone who is a Democrat is a free trader, but the Senator can not find in any tariff law the Democrats ever enacted or ever wrote anything to indicate that it was a free-trade measure.

Mr. WATSON. Then the Democratic Party is not consistent.

Mr. HARRISON. The Democratic Party is consistent.

Mr. WATSON. It is not consistent because a revenue tariff essentially means free trade.

Mr. HARRISON. That statement shows the Senator's idea of a revenue tariff. The Democratic Party does not try to fool anybody in this country.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator knows just as well as that he is alive—and he is a pretty live citizen, I will say—that a revenue tariff means free trade in all competing products.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not mean anything of the kind.

Mr. WATSON. That is precisely what it does mean.

Mr. HARRISON. That is merely the Senator's view about it.

Mr. WATSON. However, I am not going into that discussion with the Senator. What I desire to come to is this: That the Senator voted against every one of the duties on agricultural products grown in this country.

Mr. HARRISON. I presume I did, and I voted against all of the exorbitant increases in duties which the Republican Party put upon manufactured products.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator voted against every rate imposed, so far as I remember, in the present tariff law, and now he turns around and abuses us and pours out the vials of his wrath upon our heads——

Mr. HARRISON. And you need it.

Mr. WATSON. Because in an effort to impose tariff duties satisfactory to all the agricultural interests as to their efficacy we did not put them high enough to exclude all foreign agricultural products, although the Senator was against imposing tariff duties on any agricultural product coming into this country from abroad. Now, who is in a better position on that proposition? We did our level best. When we passed that act we believed that those rates would prove effective; we had every reason to believe that they would do so because everyone interested in the question who came before us testified that those rates would be effective. We acepted their conclusion; we incorporated their suggestions in the bill, and many of them have proved effective, although some have not. Now, who is in a better position on that question—the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator's conscience never hurts him about any legislative action which he may have taken, but if it ever did prick him it certainly ought to do so for his action in this instance. As for me, I am merely consistent in my attitude all the way through. I thought that it was a piece of hypocrisy, that it was a sham and pretense; I did not believe that the tariff on corn would be effective and it has proven not to be; I did not believe that the tariff on wheat would be effective and it has proven not to be; I did not believe the tariff on hay would be effective, and it has proven not to be.

Mr. McNARY rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield now to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WATSON. If I may be pardoned a moment, let me ask the Senator from Mississippi another question. The Senator voted against the rates imposed by the emergency tariff law?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that the Tariff Commission itself found, and is it not the universal testimony of the farmers everywhere who have any knowledge of the subject, that the emergency tariff law actually saved the wool industry of the United States from destruction? Is it not further a fact that the rates imposed by the emergency tariff act greatly aided the dairy interests of the United States as well? What does the Senator say about that?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator did not understand me. I have never said the tariff on wool was not effective; there is not any question about that, because we import wool every year. We do not produce sufficient wool in this country to take care of our consumption.

Mr. WATSON. But my friend from Mississippi voted against the tariff duty in that instance.

Mr. HARRISON. I did vote against it, and I would vote against it again. It was too high, and the benefits it gives to a small group did not begin to measure in the great disadvantages it worked upon so many more.

Mr. WATSON. Then, if it was effective, why did the Senator vote against it?

Mr. HARRISON. I would not put wool upon the free list. Wool is a revenue producer. A rate of duty much higher than the present rate could be put on wool and a great deal more revenue could then be raised from it, and, so far as that is concerned, on other items, such as sugar, greater revenue can be raised by virtue of the duty which is imposed because of the large importations that might come in during certain years.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but the Senator voted against those duties either as protective measures or as revenue measures.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but I do not think the duty imposed on the wool saved the wool growers of the country. The Republican Party put a tariff duty on raw wool and then they allowed compensatory duties upon every item going into the finished woolen products, and thus allowed the woolen manufacturers to increase their prices to the innumerable millions of farmers that do not produce wool in this country. The wool schedule was arranged so that the duty upon finished woolen products was about 50 per cent, I believe. Now, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there an amendment pending to the resolution now under discussion?

Mr. HARRISON. There is no pending amendment, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOWELL in the chair). No amendment to the resolution is now pending.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the resolution be amended by striking out the word "lowering," in line 2, and inserting the word "revision," and also by striking out the words "embodying lowered schedules," in line 3. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat his proposed amendment?

Mr. McNARY. I move to strike out the word "lowering" in line 2 and insert the word "revision," so that it will read "favors an immediate revision of the tariff schedule."

I move to strike out also the words "embodying lowered schedules"; so that if the resolution should be adopted as amended it would be a true expression of the sentiment which I believe exists in the Senate, namely, that there should be a revision either up or down. I myself feel that as to certain agricultural products there should be an increase in the tariff rates, and that in some instances, particularly as applied to the products of industries, there should be a lowering of rates. I wish to make the resolution liquid, so that it will meet every situation that might arise.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has made himself very clear, and I thank him for the explanation.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. President, as to the question of revenue, the Senator from Utah said that to reduce rates on everything 10 per cent would destroy the revenue. The rates of duty on sugar could be increased to 3 cents a pound and just that much more revenue could be raised. As a matter of fact, on three commodities which are imported into the United States annually in large quantities we derive over one-third of the customs revenue. From the duties on tobacco, wool, and sugar—those three items alone, we derive probably $250,000,000 a year. It would be easy enough by an increase of duty upon those items to raise as great a revenue as is derived from the whole tariff schedule at the present time.

Reference has been made to the increased importations coming into the United States. I said a moment ago that that was not the true test. I assert that under the influence of the Democratic tariff measure passed in 1913 our condition was healthier, our exports were larger, our percentage of exportations of agricultural products over importations was greater than ever it has been under the system of Republican tariffs which has been in vogue.

More real benefit came to the people of the whole country under this Democratic legislation than could possibly come under this system, because it rather equalized matters. It did not create in this country a condition whereby the manufacturers might gradually extort profits from the farmers of the country, and build up the purchasing power of their dollar, while that of the farmer gradually went down.

I do not know that we can ever invoke a system that will place the purchasing power of the dollar of every industry upon a parity; but I do know that when you create here a system that guarantees to some manufacturers such privileges, that permits them to increase capitalizations, declare dividends, enlarge their operations, and increase the percentage of their production, you will eventually put them in a position where they can fix the price of their products to the farmers and everybody else in this country.

That is what you have done by virtue of your system. The tariff system is so arranged that it can not possibly work to the advantage of the great mass of the farmers in this country. It will not do it. You will have discrimination; you will have inequalities; you will have favored treatment to some industries as against others. The whole thing is too artificial. We can, however, by legislation try to maintain a parity; and what is desired by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER] and the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and other Senators on the other side and those of us who are fighting for this proposition over here is not free trade, as some Republican Senators would have you believe. It is not particularly a tariff for revenue; it is not particularly a tariff on a competitive basis for which the Democratic Party stands; but it is for lowering the duties where the rates are now too high, and, if possible, on some items, if the conditions warrant it, increasing the duties if they are not sufficient, but to bring about a condition that will equalize the situation as much as possible.

Let us try, if we can, to restore the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar. Let us make it as it was in the halcyon days of the Democratic law in 1914, when a farmer could take his five bales of cotton to the market and buy almost dollar for dollar in exchange those things that he needed; when the wheat farmer might go to the market with his 100 bushels of wheat and exchange them on an equal basis for the things he needed. Those are the facts in the case. It can not be done now.

Mr. President, let me read some ratio prices. My friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] smiles. I like to see him smile.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, the Senator must know, of course, that the large exports of agricultural products after 1913, of which he speaks, were occasioned by the war, and the enormous demand abroad. The Senator understands that as well as anybody else.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes. Every time the Senator speaks, he gets into it. We were not in the war in 1913, however.

Mr. WATSON. But we went into the war later.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; we went into it later.

Mr. WATSON. The fact that we did not go into the war immediately had not anything to do with it. The war began within less than a year after this tariff became effective. The war on the other side began in July, 1914.

Mr. HARRISON. In 1913 the exports were $2,484,000,000. The imports were only $1,792,000,000.

In 1914 the exports were $2,113,000,000. The imports were $1,789,000,000.

But let me proceed further. Here is when we got into the war. Here is when the war began to tell.

Mr. WATSON. The war began in July, 1914.

Mr. HARRISON. Wait a minute. Facts speak more convincingly that the Senator's protestations.

Mr. WATSON. But the war began in July, 1914.

Mr. HARRISON. In 1915 our exports did rise, and during the next two or three years the war did affect the proposition——

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. But not in 1913, and not in 1914.

Mr. WATSON. Why, certainly it did.

Mr. HARRISON. Those years were under normal condition.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. HARRISON. We were not in the war. We were not influenced by it.

In 1915 our exportations rose to $3,500,000,000, and our importations were only $1,778,000,000.

In 1916 they rose further. Our exportations were four and a third billion, and our imports were practically $2,000,000,000.

In 1917 it reached away up. Now the condition has come about on which the Senator was trying to prove as an alibi. In 1917 the exportations run six and a quarter billion dollars, and our imports were only two and a half billion dollars.

When we got down under the workings of the present system, however, then our balance of trade began to decline and decline, until we do not know now whether we have a balance of trade or not. It is very small, indeed.

In 1926 the importations were $4,464,000,000, and the exportations were only $4,753,000,000—a difference of $300,000,000. That is what the Senator has done to us with the system that he has here. You have restrained international trade. You have closed the world markets to the farmers of the country, and they have been affected by virtue of it. You have not, however, slowed up the manufacturers' profits.

All you need to do is to read the history of the Aluminum Trust, and the dividends of some of the other manufacturers that my friend from South Dakota put in the RECORD yesterday. They have prosperity. If there ever was in this country a spotted prosperity, it is now. It exists only in certain industries in this country. Those industries are the ones that had a key into the back door of your committee rooms and a cord to the White House.

The importations of agricultural products as compared to the exportations of agricultural products from 1910 to 1926, inclusive, reveal that during the operation of the Underwood law the excess of exportations over importations ranged from $200,000,000 to $400,000,000. The figures show that the first year following the passage of the McCumber tariff law, 1923, the importations were $1,905,000,000 while the exportations were only $1,799,000,000.

In 1926, as I stated a moment ago, the importations were $1,918,000,000 and the exportations were only $1,891,000,000. In both instances the exportations were less than the importations.

Now, let us see the increase of exportations over importations of finished manufactures. We have seen how the importations of agricultural products were greater than the exportations. Let us see about the manufactured products. The exportation of those products showed a greater percentage of increase under the present law than under the Underwood law.

For instance, in 1913 the importations of finished manufactures amounted to $408,000,000, while the exportations of finished products were $776,000,000.

In 1914 the importations of finished manufactures were $449,000,000, while the exportations of the same things were $724,000,000.

These percentages of exportations over importations under the Underwood law are as 90 per cent and 61 per cent, respectively.

In 1923, under the present system, let us see what the percentages are. Are they lower than 90 and 61 per cent?

In the first year under the operation of the present law, 1923, the importations of finished products, both dutiable and free, were $770,000,000. The exportations for that year were $1,477,000,000—an increase of 91 per cent in the exportation of finished manufactures.

In 1924 the importations were $748,000,000; the exportations were $1,500,000,000, showing a percentage increase of 112 per cent.

In 1926 the importations were $876,000,000, while the exportations were $1,956,000,000—a percentage increase of 123 per cent.

This shows that the increase in our exportations over our importations in finished manufactured products under the present tariff rates has greatly outstripped our percentage of increase in exportations over importations of agricultural products. In addition, the table shows that the annual average of imports of agricultural products since 1920 has increased over the annual average before the war 152 per cent, whereas the average annual increase of importations of finished manufactured goods has increased only 96 per cent since 1920.

There you are. Importations of agricultural products increased 152 per cent, while in the case of manufactures the increase was only 96 per cent.

On the other hand, the annual average of exports since 1920 has increased 123 per cent on agricultural products as compared with the pre-war average, whereas the exportation of finished manufactures has increased 183 per cent since that time. That is to say, the increase of agricultural exports is less than the percentage increase of imports, whereas the percentage increase of exports of finished products is much greater than the percentage increase of imports.

Are those facts? Can they be controverted? Do they not show that agriculture, under the "benign" workings of your system, is getting an unfair deal; that the system has closed the markets of the world to our agricultural products, while under the walls of protection your manufacturing companies fleece the American consumer and sell in the markets of the world?

Oh, yes; there are some industries in this country, some manufacturing interests, that have progressed without the help, particularly, of your tariff system. It has hurt them in many instances. Take the great automobile interests of this country. They get their rubber free. They pay high import duties upon their glass. They pay high ad valorem rates upon the steel that goes into the making of the cars and upon many other things that go into them; and yet, notwithstanding that, they have been able, under the leadership of Ford, constantly to reduce the prices of automobiles and go out into the markets of the world and sell them in competition with everybody.

There are other industries that have progressed notwithstanding this favored treatment that you have given to the Steel Trust and to the Aluminum Trust and to the Woolen Trust and to the Cotton Manufacturers' Trust and these other trusts that bleed agriculture and prosper through increased dividends to their stockholders. The trouble is, your system invites retaliation in higher tariff duties from other countries, and closes or restricts those markets to those in this country who have built up great organizations without your tariff assistance.

Take the importations during the year 1926. On total importations of $4,430,000,000 there were imported into the United States, on four items, over one-third of the total.

Talk about your big importations! Of rubber we imported $505,000,000 worth. Of raw silk we imported $400,000,000 worth. Of coffee we imported $322,000,000. Of sugar we imported $232,000,000 worth. Yet Senators talk about the great importations that come here! It is due to the raw materials that have come into this country, used by the manufacturers to increase their prices to the American consumers.

Take tin and tin ore. Take many other articles—copper, which comes in to-day free, and piles high the importations. Why, you talk about importations, but it does not tell the tale. Back in 1920 we imported into the United States over a billion dollars' worth of sugar. We had to have it. We needed it. It was selling high at that time. Indeed, it was so high that the Republican Party printed a campaign pamphlet and issued it broadcast to the country and charged the Democratic Party with responsibility for the high price of sugar, notwithstanding we were importing this great amount at that time.

Let us take rubber. Look how it has increased because it has fallen into the hands of a monopoly. The same thing holds true of coffee. We have to have it. If you want to raise more revenue, if you do not want to incur some loss of revenue, you can tax coffee. I do not favor that, but we have to have coffee, because we do not produce it. It has gradually increased. Look at the increase in the importations of rubber. Back in 1921 we imported only $73,000,000 worth of rubber. Last year it was $505,000,000. That is the situation.

Mr. President, let me give you some more of the ratio of prices between farm products and those of manufactures. Immediately after the war the index of farm prices was almost, though not quite, as high as the index of prices of articles which the farmer purchased. In May, 1920, for example, the index of farm prices of 19 important products was 273 per cent of the 1913 base, and the index of the principal products purchased by the farmer was 278 per cent. There was not much difference.

Since 1920 the condition of the farmer has been getting steadily worse with respect to the relative prices of products with what he has to buy. In January, 1927, the prices of 19 representative farm products—this is under your tariff system—was 139, on the 1913 base of 100, whereas the relative prices of the principal products the farmer buys was 166 per cent. Look at the widening differences in the purchasing power of the dollars.

Stated in more detail and from a slightly different point of view, in October, 1926, 100 units of the principal farm products would purchase only 84 units of the principal products the farmer had to buy. In still greater detail, in October, 1926, a hundred units of farm products would purchase 94 units of foodstuffs, a hundred units of farm products would purchase 86 units of clothing, 76 units of household supplies, 80 units of building material.

Expressing the purchasing power of a hundred farm units in terms of individual commodities it is found that they would purchase—and here is how it affects the farmer—87 units of rope, only 70 units of men's shoes, only 59 units of women's shoes, only 72 units of cotton hosiery, 76 units of woolen suitings, 46 units of men's woolen underwear, 68 units of table plates, 66 units of knives and forks, 70 units of cotton blankets, 83 units of woolen blankets, 77 units of cotton sewing thread, 78 units of quinine, 63 units of Epsom salts.

Oh, you have taxed everything, so that it costs the farmer that much more. If he wants to take his bushel of wheat or his bale of cotton or his oats or his corn and exchange it, even for Epsom salts, his dollar would only get 63 cents worth of Epsom salts. It would purchase 84 units of shingles, 86 units of cement, 83 units of window glass, 63 units of white-lead paint.

The value of 19 important farm products was only 4 per cent greater than the value of the same products in 1913—that is, the index was 104, whereas the index for union wages for 1925 on the 1913 base was 140. Let the products of the farm be measured in union wages, and the wage earner gets $1.40 to every dollar's worth of farmer's products.

Those are facts that answer the argument of the distinguished Senator from Utah made on yesterday. He talked in his speech about labor, and how it was affected by these high-protected interests. If you will analyze the situation, in most instances you will find that the smallest pay to the laboring man comes from the most highly protected industries in this country. There are only a little more than 8,000,000 men and women working in the manufacturing interests of this country. There are 40,000,000 and more American laboring people employed on farms, in counting houses, in various places, who are not protected by these high and exorbitant tariff duties.

Mr. President, I have said about all that I want to say. I am sorry that the distinguished Senator, after my analysis of these rates on agricultural products, sought to say the Democratic Party is a free-trade party. It is not. The Democratic Party differs little, if any, from the views of men who are progressive and who believe in equal rights to all and special privileges to none, who occupy seats on the other side of the aisle.

I shall not forget the magnificent fight that was waged against special privilege in this body in 1909 when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was before this body for consideration. History recalls few characters that will live longer, who performed a greater service for the great masses of the American people than did Dolliver, from Iowa, and La Follette, from Wisconsin, and those who fought with them against the iniquitous provisions carried in that measure. They sounded the tocsin call. They aroused the West as it had never been aroused before against these rates that bore down upon that great section out across the Mississippi.

You thought then that it made little difference. The distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who was then styled a "little shepherd," sitting not far from the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who was called the "big shepherd," spurned their protestations. They did not believe that it would have any effect. But, sirs, it started the crystallization of public sentiment in that section of the country and aroused the people, who went to the polls in 1910 and swept from power the Republican Party.

You may look with no concern upon this little modest resolution offered by a Republican Senator from the far-off West. You may say it makes no difference if you pass it. You may say you will spurn it if it passes, that you will not consider it in the committee, that you and the party are bigger than any section or any class of individuals in America. Remember what happened in 1910. In my humble opinion the Senator from South Dakota and his colleagues who are working with him in this matter are beginning a crusade that will gain in number as the ides of November approach, and it will not be long before you reactionary friends of the angels of this administration, the special interests that have bled and bled the American consumer until he is snow white, will demand and concede some revision of the tariff.

Ah, we can go into the committee and in a practical, sensible way look at the conditions as they exist, not write measures in a free-trade style, not disorganize business in this country, but we can look at the cold facts; we can revise the tariff upon some basis that might help to restore the equilibrium and parity between the purchasing power of the dollars of agriculture and those of other industries in America.

I believe personally in a tariff that breeds no bounties, that spawns no special privileges. I believe in a tariff that promotes trade, not trusts. I believe in a tariff that will not tax the poor, but will take the revenue from the fortunes of the rich. I want to promote the tariff competition rather than combinations. I want to bring the peoples of the world closer to my Government through trade and commerce, and not encourage them to make war and battle against them. I want a tariff for peoples, not persons.

No wonder the precedents that you have established have found root in what other governments have done. When the last tariff law was before the Senate for consideration we said that if you passed it and put these barriers up against the importations into this country of some products that might meet in competition with the trust-made goods of this country, and give to the people some benefit in cheaper rates and prices, other countries would erect like barriers against our farmers' products being sold to them. You said no, you were a government to yourself. You did not care. You had started out on a policy of isolation. What mattered it to you what other governments might do or what other statesmen might think?

The cold facts now confront you that since you passed this law and erected these barriers 51 governments have passed high tariff rates retaliating against us. I shall put a few of them in the RECORD. It is so infamous, although the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Indiana, and maybe my friend from Ohio, have not yet caught the spirit of the new day. But remember that the great bankers of your own party, many of them whose advice has been sought, who in the past have been invited even to the White House to sit around the festive board—of course, that was just before some election was to take place, so that the shekels might fall from their bulging pockets into the coffers of the Republican Party—have spoken up. They said that the tariff ought to be revised, that agriculture was not getting a fair deal out of it, and that you ought to restore some equilibrium. That arouses my friend from Utah. He does not like it, and when the representatives of this Government sit in an international economic conference at Geneva, appointed by this Government, they are met with rebuke because they say that the tariff is one of the things that is grieving the world, that is holding European countries back, that is delaying economic rehabilitation.

That delegation was composed, not of Democrats particularly. There was one on it, Norman H. Davis, one of the finest men who has ever lived, a man who is competent to represent this Government in any body and in the consideration of any question.

But the other gentleman on that committee, whose name I have forgotten—I think it was Mr. Robinson—is whom? He is a hidebound Republican. I understand he never scratched a ticket in his life. He owns an interest in manufactures, and is a banker of repute and standing. He is one of the members of the delegation. Why, this man Robinson even served under the distinguished Vice President of the United States when he was head of the Dawes Commission. He was good enough then to serve the Government. His advice was accepted in that difficult matter. But now he differs from the Senator from Utah, and consequently he is not worth while.

Mr. O'Leary, another member of the delegation, who said the tariff ought to be revised to help agriculture, is another big Republican from Chicago, a big banker interested in manufacturing. Doctor Klein is another. What finer authority and agent of this Government could we have than he? He is the man who has employed his fine talents to build up trade throughout the world, and if my good friend from Indiana would consult him, he would have more wisdom. I like to drink from the fountainhead myself, and that is why the facts I give are good. Doctor Klein is supposed to be a good Republican. That is the delegation which is spurned here and held in contempt because they say the tariff should be revised.

I welcome this movement. I wish it were a bill, so that we could really do something. But we can do this much—we can give an expression that agriculture should be elevated, that it should be helped, that the manufacturers should not continue to be made the only favored angels of this administration. I shall vote for the resolution. I hope that it will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, following the remarks which I made this morning, a statement of some of the changes in tariff rates by various countries of the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

NOTES ON RECENT TARIFF INCREASES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

UNITED KINGDOM

On July 1, 1925, the United Kingdom reimposed the McKenna duties—i. e., the duties of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem on passenger automobiles, musical instruments, clocks, and watches, and a specific duty on cinematograph films. Later in the same year duties of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem were imposed on cutlery, gloves, and lace and embroidery. Specific duties were placed on silk and artificial silk, hops and hop extracts, and gas mantles.

In 1926 a duty of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem was placed on commercial motor cars and 16⅔ per cent ad valorem on wrapping paper. In 1927 a duty of 33⅓ per cent ad valorem was placed on automobile tires; a new specific duty of 28s. per hundredweight was placed on chinaware; and the duties on tobacco, wine, photographic film, and matches were increased.

FRANCE

Effective from April 7, 1926, the French Government applied a 30 per cent increase to all specific import duties, with certain exceptions, which included tobacco, paper pulp, and certain specified grades of paper. By a decree of August 14, 1926, specific import duties, with some exceptions, were again increased by 30 per cent. The depreciation of the franc was given as the reason for these two 30 per cent increases.

On July 10, 1926, the value for the application of a 20 per cent ad valorem import duty on positive films in France was increased from 2 francs to 5 francs per meter, making the duty 1 franc per meter.

The Franco-German treaty, effective September 6, 1927, imposed on certain lines of American goods duties four times as high as those applied to competing products from Germany, England, and other countries having most-favored-nation treaties with France. These duties were removed from American products on November 21, 1927. However, on some articles on which the United States received intermediate rates of duty and the Franco-German treaty provided new minimum rates higher than the old intermediate rates, France now applies whichever rate is the higher. Among these products are vegetable-tanned hides and skins, chamois-dressed or parchment-dressed leather, Hungarian leather, certain leather manufactures, machine-made paper, parchment and fancy paper, vehicles other than automotive and railway, milling machinery, certain fine cutlery, toys and parts, and certain rubber manufactures.

Effective from September 3, 1927, the French import duties on wheat and rye in grain or flour and certain cereal products were increased.

The table below shows the old and the new French duties on these products:

Tariff No.	Article	Import duties in francs per 100 kilos
		Former	New
68	Wheat, spelt, meslin:
	Grain	18.20	25.00
	Crushed, and grist containing more than 10 per cent of flour	37.40	45.00
	Flour, at the rate of extraction:
	70 per cent or above	37.40	45.00
	61 per cent to 70 per cent	45.90	52.00
	60 per cent and below	54.40	58.00
71	Rye:
	Grain	7.80	11.00
	Flour	17.00	19.00
75	Ship's biscuits and bread	23.80	25.00
76	Groats, grits, pearled and cleaned grain	54.40	66.00
77	Semolina in the form of pastes; Italian pastes	54.40	66.00

GERMANY

On May 19, 1925, the German Government presented a preliminary tariff revision embodying new maximum rates of duty to the Reichsrat. The German Government emphasized the possibility of obtaining reductions from these higher rates on some items by the process of tariff bargaining. The new German tariff rates became effective on various groups of items on different dates up to October 1, 1925, when the last of the new duties went into effect. The new rates on automobiles were considerably higher than the old rates, but provision was made in the law for their decrease at successive six-month intervals, beginning July 1, 1926.

By a modification of the temporary commercial agreement between France and Germany, effective from April 11, 1927, the German conventional rate on wheat flour applying to the United States was increased from 10 marks to 11.50 marks per 100 kilos. This new rate expired on June 30, 1927, and since that date wheat and rye flour from the United States and all other countries have been subject to the general rate of 12.50 marks per 100 kilos.

Effective from January 1, 1928, automobile parts, formerly dutiable according to their component material, become subject to the generally higher rates applicable to complete automobiles or complete automobile motors.

The rates of duty on automobiles after January 1, 1928, under the decreasing plan provided in 1925 are as follows:

	Gold marks per 100 kilos
Automobiles weighing less than 2,200 kilos	100
Automobiles weighing 2,200 to 3,200 kilos	75
Automobiles weighing over 3,200 kilos	70

ITALY

The Italian Government has made increases in tariff rates on various items and groups of items in the last two years. In 1926 import duties were reimposed on machinery and materials for new construction. Large duty increases were made on hides and skins and their manufactures. The import duty on newsprint paper increased from 5 gold lira to 8 gold lira per 100 kilos, effective November 1, 1926. Effective from December 19, 1926, import duties were increased on agricultural machinery, typewriters, cash registers, meters, motor cycles, and cinematograph films. Further increases were made on a long list of commodities, effective from February 18, 1927.

BELGIUM

The duty on refined mineral oil of a density under 0.78 at 15° C. was increased from 20 francs per hectoliter to 40 francs per hectoliter, effective January 1, 1926.

Increases in import duties on an extensive list of articles in Belgium were made by a law of June 7, 1926, and decree of June 24, 1926. Among the increases of special interest to American exporters were those applying to gasoline, kerosene, lubricating oils, sugar, and unmanufactured tobacco.

Important increases in coefficients applied to specific rates of import duty in Belgium, especially on luxury goods, became effective June 28, 1926. Among the commodities affected were cereal flours, certain fruits, industrial chemicals, textile products, clothing, expensive woods, tires, rubber belting, and metallurgical finished products.

After July 28, 1926, special authorization was required for the importation of flour.

Effective from November 2, 1926, import duties were increased on an extensive additional list of products, including fresh and dried fruits, automobiles and parts, and many other items. More increases went into effect January 24, 1927.

NETHERLANDS

A new customs law became effective from July 1, 1925. The duties on most items were increased from 5 to 8 per cent ad valorem with a few classes of goods subject to higher duties, such as motor vehicles (12 per cent) and package foods (20 per cent ad valorem).

CUBA

A complete revision of the import duties containing many increases in rates was put into effect October 26, 1927.

MEXICO

Mexican import duties were increased on a number of items April 22, 1925.

An extensive revision of the tariff was made March 7, 1927. Approximately 350 items were changed, most of the rates being increased, but there were also a few decreases.

AUSTRALIA

The Australian import tariff schedule was revised September 3, 1925. Duties on iron and steel products were increased August 12, 1926.

Effective September 29, 1927, increases were made in the duties and the British preference on automobile chassis. On unassembled chassis the general rate of duty was increased from 12½ per cent to 17½ per cent ad valorem and on assembled chassis from 17½ per cent to 25 per cent ad valorem.

A tariff revision on 135 items, mostly upward, was presented to Parliament November 24, 1927, and became effective the following day, subject to parliamentary approval.

NEW ZEALAND

A revised schedule of import duties increasing the British preference and providing many increases of 5 per cent and 10 per cent ad valorem in the general rates became effective September 13, 1927, subject to confirmation by the legislative body. Further amendments to the revised tariff were presented on October 13, 1927.

SWITZERLAND

The Swiss import duties on automobiles were increased. The tariff classification according to weight was changed at the same time, making it difficult to determine the exact amount of the increase.

CANADA

Canada is about the only country which during the past few years, while other countries have increased their import duties, has made a number of decreases in duties and practically no increases. Decreases have been made on sugar, agricultural and other machinery, automobiles, and many other products. In some cases, particularly on textile items, the preference on British products has been increased.

Mr. KENDRICK. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is engaged in the work of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I always listen with keen interest to the mellifluous flow of speech from the lips of my distinguished and beloved friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I heard him in Madison Square Garden, in that demonstration which our Democratic friends had which lasted most of the summer, and his clarion voice sounded like a bugle call across the hills and valleys of the Republic summoning the hosts of democracy to battle. I am not unaware of the fact that the answer to that call on behalf of my eloquent friend was a 7,000,000 majority against the thing he advocated. Therefore I have not been seriously alarmed at the attack he has made to-day upon the citadel of protection.

I recall further that my friend from Mississippi, while having voted twice against the McNary bill, to-day intimated that he intended to vote for it; and further that while he has inveighed in caustic terms against the Finance Committee or its Republican membership and the Republican membership of this body for having failed to formulate a tariff bill in which the rates on agricultural imports were sufficiently high, that he has voted even against those rates and against every rate imposed upon any agricultural import from the time he became a Senator down to the present hour. Therefore it might be that my friend would respond that consistency is for small minds and that—

New conditions teach new duties.
Time makes ancient good uncouth.

But after all, when we are being criticized for having failed to protect the agricultural interests of the country by rates sufficiently high, it ill becomes my friend, who has voted against every rate ever sought to be imposed by any tariff bill on agricultural imports, to criticize us because of that policy.

Personally, I am somewhat in a singular situation at this time. I am against the resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER], and yet I am in favor of farm legislation. I want, as briefly as I may, to give a reason for the faith that is within me on both propositions. I am against the one because I am for the other. The McNary bill was founded upon the proposition that the tariff should be made effective. That was the very core of it all and the purpose of it all. If the tariff be abrogated there is no foundation upon which the McNary proposition can rest in the future.

The problem confronting agriculture in the United States is a stupendous one and one that has been the subject of intensive debate throughout the life of the Republic. Inability to agree does not furnish proof that there is no proper solution, but debate and discussion must continue until one shall have been found and applied. With occasional fluctuations agriculture has been on a comparative decline since 1900 and has not maintained its former level with industry.

The Republican platform adopted in 1924 recognized that fact and gave a specific pledge to the people of the country that legislation would be enacted to restore agriculture to the level of industry. That meant two things: First, that it was not on the level of industry, and secondly, that by legislation it could be restored to that level. The Democratic platform contained almost the same provision—at least the same in meaning—yet we have not redeemed that promise and have not fulfilled that pledge. Still, however, the occasion is here when some legislation along that line should be enacted in the interest of the American farmer.

However, it is not wise, in my judgment, for any friend of agriculture to take the position that unless he can at once get all he wants by way of governmental relief he will kick the whole eastern side out of the House, for he must remember that the western side can not stand after the eastern side shall have been kicked out, but that the whole edifice will fall together. Revenge is not a proper foundation upon which to erect an enduring structure in either individual or in national life.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. I will yield in a moment. Assuredly it can in no way inure to the benefit of agriculture to attempt to destroy or even to undertake the initial steps to destroy its home market and impair the ability of its present purchasers to buy the products of the American farm. Now I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. I was interested in the statement or implication made by the Senator that the reason for the introduction of this resolution was due to a spirit of revenge.

Mr. WATSON. No; I did not mean that.

Mr. McMASTER. Well, what did the Senator mean? Does the Senator think that the resolution was inspired in any way from a sense of revenge on the part of the farmer?

Mr. WATSON. I do not.

Mr. McMASTER. I do not quite understand, then, why the Senator used the word "revenge."

Mr. WATSON. I used it because I have heard many times throughout my section of the country and farther on toward the West that the farmers would rise against the protective tariff system unless it was extended to them in accordance with their wishes. That was the reason for my statement.

Mr. McMASTER. Does not the distinguished Senator from Indiana feel, after the farmers have been knocking at the doors of Congress for six or seven years, and those doors have been closed in their faces continuously for that long period, that it is time that agricultural relief were provided?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from South Dakota knows that there is no man in this body who has devoted himself more assiduously to the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill than have I. By voice and by vote and by assistance in organization I have helped to promote the passage of that measure, and I intend to do so again. In doing that, however, I am not actuated by any desire to destroy the protective tariff in any particular or for any purpose.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, first, I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Indiana for the position he has taken upon the farm relief question. He is one of the few Members of this body who are considered as belonging to the old school who have taken a decided stand. However, I wish to say that there is not one word, one sentence, or one syllable in the resolution which seeks in any shape, manner, or form to destroy the principle of protection; but I wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Indiana if, in his own mind, he does not think that there are a few industrial schedules in which the duties imposed are too high?

Mr. WATSON. That is a matter of individual opinion. I have been a student of the tariff for 35 years; I have made as many tariff speeches in my time, perhaps, as any living American and I have always tried as best I could to have the tariff measure the real difference between the cost of production at home and abroad in fixing any rate on any item of import. I think that is the only proper course to pursue.

It may be that some of the rates are too high. I do not now know. It may be that some of them are too low. I can not now say. I do know, however, that we brought into this country last year four and one-half billion dollars worth of foreign products. A billion dollars worth of them approximately were noncompetitive, such as rubber, raw silk, and so forth, but $3,000,000,000 worth were competitive. I also know that we can not bring into this country $3,000,000,000 worth of competitive products without in some way or other interfering with American industry.

I know that whenever we buy a coat which is made abroad we do not buy a coat which is made in the United States, and to that extent we put out of business the man who is making that coat in the United States and those who make coats generally. The same thing is also true of every other article of import which we bring into this country. If I had my way about it, I would make rates just as high as I could on all imports adequately to protect the American producer whatever his occupation or in whatever field of activity he may be working.

Mr. McMASTER. Will the Senator from Indiana yield for one more question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. McMASTER. It was stated here yesterday on the floor by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the administration had stated that there would not be tariff reduction for two years. That implied that possibly in two years there would be tariff reduction. If there would be reason for a tariff reduction in two years from now, why should not there be a reason for a tariff reduction at the present time?

Mr. WATSON. I did not hear the Senator from Utah make the statement to which the Senator from South Dakota refers; I have not talked to the President about the matter; I do not know what his views are; but I know, as the Senator from South Dakota will recognize, that, with the revenue bill ahead of us, if we should attempt to pass tariff legislation we would stay here the whole summer through and could not get away. I want to say this to my friend, inasmuch as——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is there any objection to staying here all summer if we can thereby enact legislation to give the farmers the relief which the Republican platform promised them?

Mr. WATSON. I will say to my friend from Iowa that I think it can be done otherwise. I wish to say further to my friend from Iowa and also to my distinguished friend from South Dakota that we have heretofore encountered situations of this kind, and we know what the gentlemen on the other side will resort to in the teeth of a campaign when it comes to making a tariff bill. We permitted that to be done in 1890, and they swept us out of power because they devoted months upon months to a discussion of the tariff bill and never permitted it to be passed until two weeks before the election. It did not have time to be tried and tested practically in the country; people rose up against it, and they defeated even McKinley for Congress in his district, although he was the author of the bill.

Not only that, but in the last election they talked and debated the Fordney-McCumber bill for weeks and weeks and weeks; they discussed the tariff on vinegar for two weeks; and they kept talking about the bill until it was passed only a short time before the election; and so the people had no opportunity to measure it and determine what it would do, and we had no chance to ascertain what the real benefits of it would be. I do not intend to be caught in that kind of a trap again, if I know it. I am opposed to any tariff revision at this time, because I believe that by the enactment of just and meritorious legislation aside from the tariff we can so bolster up the tariff rates and schedules as to insure adequate protection to agriculture in the United States of America. However, I may say to my friend that I am not quite sure that any tariff rates which the Congress might impose would be sufficiently high to protect agriculture in the United States against some of its competitors in other lands. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator pictures the Democrats on the other side as a bad and designing lot——

Mr. WATSON. Oh, they are.

Mr. BROOKHART. And as wanting to win the election.

Mr. WATSON. They do.

Mr. BROOKHART. But is that any reason why the Republican side does not carry out its pledge to the farmers of the United States?

Mr. WATSON. I can not answer for the Republican side. There have been times when I could not answer for my friend from Iowa who is on the Republican side. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKHART. I remember, however, a time when the Senator from Indiana has answered even for me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I only know that right in the teeth of an election is no time to start out to revise the tariff, and I only know that, so far as I am concerned, I would rather the tariff rates remain just as they are than to attempt to revise them in the face of a presidential election and in the midst of a presidential campaign. I have been through contests of that kind, and I know just what they meant.

I will say further to my friend that if there were no other way by which agriculture might be adequately protected, even under these extreme and emergent conditions, I might be willing to see tariff revision undertaken, but there is another way and another method that I believe will prove adequate and effective for the protection of the agricultural interests of the country, and I know that wisdom as well as prudence demands that we shall march along that path. I want my farmer friend also——

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. McMASTER. The Senator states that there is another way of equalizing the condition of the farmer, that is to put him on a parity with other forms of industry, namely, by the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill or other legislation of the same substantial nature. Now, suppose that such legislation shall be passed and then shall be vetoed by the President; then what position will the Republican Party be in with reference to the redemption of its pledge?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have never been one of those who thought it necessary to go up to the White House every morning to find out what we should do as a senatorial body on that day. I believe that we have a duty to perform; I believe that we have a burden to carry; I believe that we have an obligation to discharge; and I am in favor of doing it regardless of what happens at the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. McMASTER. Yes; but it is highly important that the Republican Party do something to redeem its pledge to the farmer.

Mr. WATSON. With that sentiment I cordially concur and to the expression of the Senator I fully agree.

Mr. McMASTER. What plan has the Senator to offer in the event that the proposed farm legislation shall be vetoed by the President? We had better stay here all summer, had we not?

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator want me to answer that question?

Mr. McMASTER. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WATSON. I really ought to answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota first, but I will yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask the Senator whether he does not think he is taking the Senator from South Dakota just a little too seriously? Does he believe that the Senator from South Dakota really contemplates a general lowering of tariff duties?

Mr. WATSON. I am going to come to that after a while, and ask him that question myself.

Mr. BRUCE. I should think the Senator would do that first.

Mr. McMASTER. I will be very glad to answer that question.

Mr. WATSON. I have been wanting to ask that question.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator from South Dakota does really contemplate a universal lowering of the tariff, I do not see how he could possibly expect to get any considerable number of Democratic votes for his resolution.

Mr. WATSON. That is one of the most comforting assurances I have had at this session from any source. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. Did any party ever provide for such a lowering of tariff rates in the history of the country since the Civil War?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly, the Democratic Party did when it had a chance.

Mr. BRUCE. Every one of our tariff laws since the war has been protective, more or less.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Maryland forgets the Morrison Tariff Act which provided for a horizontal 20 per cent reduction, which just whacked the duties off regardless of where such action would strike.

Mr. BRUCE. Was it not Mr. Cleveland who said that it was a condition and not a theory that confronted us?

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but there was tariff reduction all along the line.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not wish to use any inconsiderate language, but it is hard for me to believe that this resolution is offered in good faith if it contemplates a lowering of all tariff duties.

Mr. McMASTER. Anything that does not come out of Maryland or anything that is not wet is not in good faith, in the opinion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have no desire to enter into a personal controversy as between my two distinguished friends. I cheerfully accord to my friend from South Dakota, of course, the highest motives; I have no question about that.

Mr. BRUCE. Is the Senator from Indiana saying that for the sake of the argument?

Mr. WATSON. No; I am saying it because I believe he is an honest man; I am saying it because I believe he is serving the interests of his constituency in introducing this resolution, as he believes.

Mr. BRUCE. Is he serving the interests of his constituents by lowering the duty on Canadian wheat?

Mr. WATSON. That is up to him to decide.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. Oh, surely; I am interested in this.

Mr. McMASTER. I wish to say just a word in answer to the statement made by the Senator from Maryland, although I found but two days ago that he was here making a speech entirely in accord with this resolution, condemning high industrial rates; and on the second day he made a splendid high-protection speech.

In reference to the particular resolution that is pending, however, if I may explain the intent and purpose that was in the mind of the author, I will say that if I had intended in the resolution that all schedules should be lowered I would have used the word "all"; but I used the word "schedules"; and I expect to amend that by putting in the word "general," that there shall be a general lowering, so that my distinguished friend from Maryland will be able to vote for the resolution.

Mr. BRUCE. I will ask the Senator why he did not do that first?

Mr. McMASTER. That will explain the situation for the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. No; it does not.

In the first place, the Senator stated that I had made two speeches in the Senate on the subject of the tariff. I am afraid the Senator is confusing me with a much more distinguished and much abler man—that is to say, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I have had no occasion to say anything on the subject of the tariff except once, and then tentatively, to commit myself to the proposition that the whole matter of fixing tariff duties should be lodged in some nonpartisan commission, subject to the approval of Congress.

Mr. WATSON. Which, of course, I do not believe at all.

Mr. McMASTER. No; nor I either.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. FESS. The language of the resolution is general—

Immediate lowering of tariff schedules, and tariff legislation, embodying lowered schedules.

The question I want to ask is does not that include the seventh schedule, which is agriculture?

Mr. WATSON. Why, according to my understanding, of course, by the terms of the resolution. As to whether or not the Senator meant to include the agricultural schedule, of course I do not know.

Mr. FESS. We are considering this resolution.

Mr. WATSON. But, as I read the resolution, it means a lowering all along the line of the rates imposed by all schedules.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The first act of the Congress that met in 1921 was the emergency tariff act, passed in May of that year.

Mr. WATSON. It was.

Mr. FESS. I have it in my hand. There are 28 items in that act, everyone of which, without an exception, is agricultural; and most of those items were included in the permanent tariff legislation of September of the next year.

Mr. WATSON. Practically embodied in it.

Mr. FESS. Yes. Has the Senator had any information to the effect that there is a demand from agriculture for the lowering of the schedules under the present act?

Mr. WATSON. I have not from anybody, anywhere.

Mr. FESS. I made inquiry of the Tariff Commission, and I am told officially that there are 585 applications for investigations. Two hundred and fifty-seven of these are for agriculture, all but two of them asking for an increase.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, may I interrupt just there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. McMASTER. How many of those farmers were asking for increases on industrial products?

Mr. FESS. I asked the question as to whether there had been any demand for a decrease of tariff duties on agricultural products. I did not ask with reference to nonagricultural products. The resolution of the Senator from South Dakota applies to agricultural products just the same as it does to nonagricultural products.

Mr. McMASTER. May I interrupt the Senator again? If we should amend the resolution in that respect, so as to conform to the Senator's ideas, would he then vote for it?

Mr. FESS. I certainly would not. If the Senator will offer a resolution here for the revision of the tariff schedules, I shall be willing to discuss it with the Senator; but the Senator has demanded a lowering of the schedules. That includes every schedule; and that is why there has been a general resentment against that sort of legislation.

Mr. BRUCE and Mr. McMASTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. WATSON. To all the Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the first Senator to address the Chair was the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator from Indiana had yielded to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the Chair's understanding.

Mr. WATSON. I yielded to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. A further statement:

The commission has completed and sent to the President 28 reports, covering 35 articles, 9 of which are agricultural products. Action has been taken on several of these. Based on the investigations made by the commission, the President has adjusted rates of duty on six agricultural products—wheat from 30 cents to 42 cents per bushel; wheat flour from 78 cents to $1.04 per 100 pounds; butter from 8 to 12 cents per pound; Swiss cheese from 5 cents per pound, not less than 25 per cent ad valorem, to 7½ cents per pound, not less than 37½ per cent ad valorem. Here are the exceptions: The duty on milk feeds, such as bran and shorts and other by-product feeds, which the farmers purchase for feeding livestock, was reduced from 15 to 7½ per cent ad valorem; and the duty on quail was reduced from 50 to 25 cents per bird. In other words, there are two items on which there was a reduction.

Referring to the question I asked about corn, the American Farm Bureau has presented to the commission and they are making an investigation of an increase of the duty on corn from 15 cents to some higher figure; I do not recall just what they are asking. My question was—and it grew out of the introduction of this resolution by a representative of the great farming section—whether this resolution would not be counter to what we generally regard throughout the country as a demand for an increase rather than a lowering. That is my specific question.

Mr. WATSON. That is my view of it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. For the RECORD, I desire to add that very recently the President has granted the petition of agriculturists, and has issued an appropriate order increasing the tariff on certain brands of imported cherries by the full 50 per cent permissible under the flexible section of the tariff act.

I also wish to have it appear that there are pending before the commission two petitions, filed there by agriculturists, seeking increase of the tariff on imported onions and also upon poultry products. Both these petitions are supported by a vast number of producers, all of whom, I take it, are hopeful, as I am, that the President may be persuaded to increase the duties.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. First, I wish to say, in reference to the statements of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that practically all of the Members of this body who favor the resolution understand and comprehend that the purport and the intent of the resolution is for the purpose of lowering some of these outrageous schedules that were accorded the industrial products, and thereby, by lowering those schedules, increasing the purchasing power of the farmer.

It was ably shown here on the floor of the Senate this morning by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that that kind of a resolution would even permit the raising of a certain schedule upon a manufactured product if it should be necessary; but those who are trying to find fault with the language are trying to find a loophole through which they can escape and avoid voting for the resolution and then make excuses therefor. This resolution was introduced in the interest of agriculture and with the object and the aim of bringing about a reduction in some of those exorbitant schedules that are accorded industry and that have given some of the industries these enormous profits.

Mr. WATSON. What schedules are they?

Mr. McMASTER. For instance, as I suggested yesterday, there is a little company up here in Providence, R. I., known as the Brown-Sharpe Co., which just a few months after the passage of this law declared a stock dividend of 16,000 per cent. I should say that they had been pretty well taken care of; that they were in a rather prosperous condition when this particular law was passed in 1922. I should say that the Aluminum Co. have done pretty well, in view of the fact that we inserted in the RECORD yesterday that beginning with a capital of $1,500,000 that capital had grown by leaps and bounds until in a few years it had reached the sum of $131,000,000; and that on their finished product—that is, the finished aluminum cooking utensils—the American consumer pays a duty of 11 cents a pound and a 55 per cent ad valorem duty, while upon milk the farmer has asked for a duty of 3½ cents a gallon and was allowed just 2½ cents, or about 5 per cent of the value of the product. I will say that there are a number of those schedules that ought to be lowered; and by reason of lowering those schedules we can increase the purchasing power of the farmer and help to restore the equality between agriculture and the industries.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, just one moment more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana further yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WATSON. I will yield once more.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that while the Senator from South Dakota says now that he is prepared to accept an amendment to his resolution, yesterday when such an amendment was suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] he made no such announcement; nor did he make any such announcement when the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] brought forward a similar amendment to-day.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. McMASTER. When the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made the suggestion to me on the floor of the Senate I stated that I did not choose to quibble over words in the resolution; that I thought I was willing to make any particular change. I tried to make changes that would suit even the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], so that he could vote for the resolution.

Mr. BRUCE. Was not that a little like saying, "I do not choose to be a candidate for the Presidency"? Was that the kind of language in which willingness to accept an amendment would usually be indicated? I say what I do simply because my suspicion is—it may be nothing but a perfectly unjust suspicion—that the Senator from South Dakota is trying to use this resolution of his as a whip with which to compel the regular Republicans in this body to support the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, this resolution was introduced for the reasons that I have already enumerated here upon the floor of the Senate; also to serve notice upon the industrial interests here in America that the hour has come when the farmers of America are going to strike for their economic independence, and they are going to begin with that method, and they have some other methods that they are going to use later on; and if they do not receive that economic independence pretty soon, they have another method, the ballot, that will bring them the final results that they intend to procure.

Mr. BRUCE. In other words, as I hope you will all become Democrats. Is that it?

Mr. WATSON. Which certainly will relieve everybody in the United States of anything he has.

Mr. BRUCE. But what kind of Democrats?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has the floor. Does he desire to proceed?

Mr. WATSON. Now, if everybody is through, I will resume.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In order that we may inject a little pleasantry into the serious speech of the Senator from Indiana, I want to suggest that the Senator from New Jersey says that the reason why it took two weeks for the Democrats to discuss the item of vinegar was because it involved certain phases of the prohibition question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I did not recall that the Senator from Maryland was in the Senate at that time.

Mr. BRUCE. I was not; but I will say I was delighted a few moments ago to find that the discussion was leading us to the discussion of brandied cherries from the State of California.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I believe that the problem of agriculture is to lift agriculture up and not to pull industry down. I can not conceive that agriculture is to be helped by lowering or even disturbing schedules on manufactured products unless there be some great outrage which should be remedied or some manifest unfairness that should be corrected. I can not conceive that by interfering with the manufacturing industries of this country, by permitting large imports of manufactured products from abroad, by bringing our laboring people into keen and merciless competition with the underpaid and underfed people of the world, that by lowering the general wage level in the United States, which is the home market of the American farmer, we thereby help agricultural industry in this Nation.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. I just want to say to the distinguished Senator from Indiana that every Member on this side of the Chamber who is opposed to the resolution is always insisting that there is something about the resolution that is going to drive labor out of employment, that is going to close down the industries. As a matter of fact, all that the resolution would do, if it were put into force and effect, would be to squeeze out some excess profits from manufacturers and distribute those excess profits among the common people of America and increase their purchasing power. There is not one line or one sentence or one syllable in the resolution that is intended or proposes to throw labor out of employment.

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator must know, in the first place—and I mean no offense—that this can be no more than a gesture, because the Senate has no right to originate legislation of this kind. The Senator must know, in the second place, that if his resolution should pass it would not mean anything.

Mr. McMASTER. If this resolution should pass and it would not mean anything, what is the use of all this discussion? Why does the distinguished Senator from Indiana take up any time on this matter if it does not mean anything?

Mr. WATSON. Because I am going to prove that it does not mean anything. I mean this, I will say to my friend, the Senator from South Dakota—and he will understand there is nothing offensive about this: I mean that you can not just pass a resolution and say that we are going to lower a tariff rate. Congress is the only authority. Congress must determine what these schedules will be. Congress must fix the tax on every item. Congress must fix every rate that goes into the bill. You can not just waive a wand and say "Tariff rates are hereby reduced." Somebody has to legislate. All the schedules must come under legislative scrutiny. Every item must go through the regular process of going into the Ways and Means Committee, and then into the House, and then before the Finance Committee of the Senate, and then into the Senate.

Everybody knows that that takes months and months of time, and the most serious debate, and the most earnest consideration. No measure receives the real attention that a tariff bill does under ordinary circumstances, because it enters into every home in the Nation, and touches every industry from ocean to ocean. Is not that true? Therefore, if we should pass this resolution, what could the House of Representatives do with it? Suppose the House were to pass it; what would it signify, what would it mean? It would be sent to the Ways and Means Committee, and then the Ways and Means Committee, if they wanted to follow it out, would begin to have tariff hearings, and run for weeks and even months in having tariff hearings, and then formulate a measure along the line of the policy suggested by the resolution, then fling it into the House. Then the House would begin that consideration which the House gives to such measures, and if it should pass it, it would be sent to the Senate and referred to the Finance Committee. We would take our turn at it, then it would come into the Senate of the United States, where it would not be passed more than one week prior to the next election, I know, and so does the Senator. That is the situation.

Therefore, merely passing this resolution is of no avail.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, if the passage of this resolution is a good thing, and if it would be a good thing to have a lowering of some of the tariff schedules, then it would be perfectly proper to go through all of the effort and all of the trouble and spend all of the time that we would have to spend here during next spring and next summer to accomplish the desired result. Is it the interest of one party over another party, an election approaching, or what interest is paramount to the interests of the American people and of the American farmer?

Mr. WATSON. It is in the interest of maintaining these industries in the United States until such time as, measuring our steps, we may in orderly manner proceed to the reconstruction.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he heard the statement made more than once by the distinguished Senator from Utah yesterday, that this resolution was already slowing up business? I make the inquiry, whether he recollects that statement made by the Senator, in response to his statement that it is a mere gesture, and can not possibly have any effect.

Mr. WATSON. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from Utah. He usually speaks by the card. He usually tells what he knows. So far as I am concerned, I know of no slowing up in the country because of the introduction of this resolution, because in my humble judgment the country does not believe the resolution will pass, and if it does, that it can not be consequential in its effect, because everybody knows that it must go to the House of Representatives before it can be made effective.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator had a distinguished career in the House. What, in his judgment, would the House do with this resolution if we should pass it and send it over there? Would they receive it?

Mr. WATSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that question, because under the rules here we are not permitted to comment on the body at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. FESS. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator from Iowa rose first.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator suggested that there has been no slowing up of industry under this wonderful protection and prosperity that we have in the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I did not say that.

Mr. BROOKHART. I read a statement from the Department of Commerce about our great prosperity under this system, and then I sent over to the department for its bulletin on the earnings of corporations. I knew that 90 per cent of the farmers of the United States were on the verge of bankruptcy, and I wanted to see what the corporations were doing.

In 1925, out of 430,000 corporations, 177,738 were operating at a loss of nearly $2,000,000,000, and they had been operating since 1922 in the same way. So I think there is some inequality in this tariff prosperity we have in the United States, even among the corporations themselves.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, that only adds to the complexity of the problem. If that be the situation, we ought to raise the tariff.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did I understand the Senator to say that a higher tariff would increase prosperity? Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. WATSON. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did I understand the Senator to say that to raise the tariff would increase prosperity?

Mr. WATSON. It always has.

Mr. CARAWAY. It has?

Mr. WATSON. Always.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, when you have an era of profitless prosperity, why does not the party in power go to work and raise the tariff?

Mr. WATSON. I have already answered that question two or three times.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was the answer?

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator pardon me? I do not care to go all over that again about what it means to revise the tariff at this particular time. I will not go into that.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, the Senator is perfectly willing for agriculture to die——

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. And other business languish, in order not to disturb a political situation.

Mr. WATSON. Not at all. I have said that there is another way, and the Senator has worked with me side by side and shoulder to shoulder in working out that other plan by which agriculture can be benefited and protected in the United States, in addition to the tariff.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not what I asked.

Mr. WATSON. Not only that, but the Senator can not see that by imposing higher rates on agricultural products we could adequately protect agriculture.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is exactly what we are coming to. I absolutely know that the tariff, so far as the farmer is concerned, is absolute "bunk"; that he gets nothing out of it except an increased cost of living. Everybody knows that.

Mr. WATSON. I am going into that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if he has the figures as to the amount of food products coming into this country at this time.

Mr. WATSON. I have them here somewhere. I do not recall them.

Mr. BORAH. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are about $2,500,000,000 of food products coming into this country.

Mr. WATSON. It is very large, I know.

Mr. BORAH. Which the American farmer is perfectly capable of producing.

Mr. WATSON. I agree with the Senator entirely, and I believe in raising the rate as far as we can adequately to protect that industry. But there may come a time when we can not protect the industry by rates sufficiently high. We can not levy an embargo on articles of agriculture coming into the country, and that is why I favored the McNary plan, a plan to buttress the tariff and to make it effective wherein it was not effective.

For instance, take the tariff on wheat. We passed a tariff of 30 cents a bushel on wheat. By and by it was found that that was not adequately protective. A complaint was made to the Tariff Commission, and after the requested hearing the Tariff Commission reported that it would take 42 cents a bushel to measure the difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada in the production of a bushel of wheat. Whereupon the President—and I think quite properly—raised the tariff on wheat to 42 cents a bushel.

Mr. CARAWAY. And wheat went down that week.

Mr. WATSON. It now transpires that wheat is selling for more in Winnipeg than in the United States. It now transpires that 42 cents does not measure that difference at this time.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator——

Mr. WATSON. Wait a moment. Remember the question, if you can, and give it to me after a while. Let me finish this, if you please.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me inject this, so that the Senator can make his argument consistently. Wheat went down 9 cents a bushel when they raised the tariff.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then the tariff did not help the farmer.

Mr. WATSON. It did not help him. That is what I am saying.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not know that was what the Senator was saying.

Mr. WATSON. That does not add to what I am already saying about it. If the tariff is not effective on wheat at 42 cents a bushel, then should we not do something to make it effective if we mean to have a protective tariff on wheat?

Mr. BORAH. If you can not raise the tariff high enough to protect the wheat raiser in this country, it is as certain as that night follows the day that you can not do it by inverting the tariff proposition, as in the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. WATSON. I do not think we invert it at all. I think we simply support it and buttress it, to make the tariff effective wherein it is ineffective. I am coming to that in a little bit, if the Senator will listen to me.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on the question of the Winnipeg wheat?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator followed the operations of the wheat pool that was started some time in September?

Mr. WATSON. I kept it up partially, but the Senator knows I was in the hospital part of the summer, and I did not keep up fully and accurately with those reports.

Mr. FESS. I think it would be perfectly obvious that if we could employ a method such as is used in Canada by which we could control the marketing as they are controlling it, we could fix the price also on wheat as Winnipeg has.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. On that question of wheat, the Canadian pool had its price fixed at the world market in Liverpool, the same place where the Chicago market had its price fixed. The pool helpel us as much as it did Canada. It improved the world price and stabilized the world price. I think there is no doubt about that. But here is the kind of protection we have on wheat under our 42 cents a bushel. September 8 at Minneapolis No. 1 winter wheat was selling at from $1.33 to $1.38. At Winnipeg it was selling at $1.52⅜.

Mr. WATSON. That is what we are saying.

Mr. BROOKHART. Something happened on September 12. November 16 in Minneapolis it was $1.24 to $1.30, and in Winnipeg $1.50⅞. So the spread increased 8 cents on wheat between September and November. Something happened to cause that increase.

The thing that happened was the Canadian Railway Commission lowered railway rates about that time and immediately the Canadian farmers got that much better price, and half of our whole tariff of 42 cents a bushel is nullified by discrimination in freight rates in the United States to start with.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator from Indiana approve of the statement of the Senator from Iowa about the transportation rate fixing the price?

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no, I do not; but I can not go into that question. That is on the sidetrack now.

Mr. FESS. I wondered whether the Senator would fall for that statement.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator from Ohio dispute that proposition?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio does dispute the proposition. The rate may measure what the producers get, but it does not modify the price that the consumers pay. The farmer who raises wheat in Iowa and sells it in New York will have to pay out of the thing he gets in New York the price for the transportation. The price to the consumer has not changed, but the price to the producer is lowered by the amount of the transportation he pays.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I understood the Senator from Iowa to contend.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is exactly my point.

Mr. FESS. No; what the Senator from Iowa said, as I understood it, was what wheat was ranging in Winnipeg, as he gave the figures.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I quoted those prices because that illustrates what the producer gets.

Mr. FESS. What is the price at Minneapolis?

Mr. BROOKHART. It was 10 or 15 cents less at Minneapolis than at Winnipeg, and then they lowered the freight rates and then it was 20 or 25 cents less.

Mr. FESS. The only effect upon the producers of wheat in Winnipeg and Minneapolis would be the difference in the freight rates they had to pay to where they marketed. It would not be the difference in the price paid by the consumer, but the difference is in the amount the producer got. The one gets more than the other because he does not suffer so much in the market.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what I claim. Under this beneficent protection of 42 cents a bushel on wheat, the farmers of the United States have taken for the present crop from 10 to 20 cents less per bushel than the Canadian farmers got.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Iowa want us to repeal it all?

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to repeal it wherever it is excessive. I want to put it on the basis of the cost of production of every article. I think that would raise it on most farm products while lowering it on industrial products.

Mr. WATSON. Not all industrial products.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not, merely because it may defeat some candidate for President, want to shirk my duty in the Senate, and say we will wait until after next election. Congress ought to have been called in session immediately after the close of the last session to settle this great question, this greatest calamity that ever come to the American people, this greatest problem that has confronted the people—equality of agriculture—the greatest problem since the abolition of slavery itself.

Mr. WATSON. I cordially agree with the Senator as to the momentous character of the problem which confronts agriculture at this time and demands solution at the hands of the American Congress. I have no doubt at all about the character of that problem. I believe, as strongly as the Senator believes, that the time has come when steps must be taken to rehabilitate agriculture in the United States and bring it to the level of industry in accordance with the campaign pledges of both parties, so we shall have a full-rounded, symmetrical civilization in the United States. But I do not agree with the Senator, nor with my friend from South Dakota, as to the method which shall be pursued to reach that desired objective.

We have been talking about the remissness of the Republican Congress with regard to the agricultural schedule. The truth about it is that the very first thing we did was to enact an emergency tariff law. Is there any one here sorry that we enacted that law? I wonder if my friend from Iowa or my friend from South Dakota will say that he did not rejoice in the effect of that act? Everybody knows how beneficially it resulted to the agricultural interests of the United States. The Tariff Commission itself found, after a full hearing on the subject, that it had saved the wool industry of the country from absolute destruction and greatly aided the dairying industry of the United States as well. I do not think that proposition can be successfully controverted.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I will.

Mr. FESS. The Senator remembers that in the House the emergency tariff act was almost nonpartisan.

Mr. WATSON. It was nonpartisan.

Mr. FESS. The Democratic Members voted for it the same as the Republicans.

Mr. WATSON. I am glad the Senator called my attention to that fact.

Mr. BROOKHART. And since that time nearly a million farmers have lost their homes in the United States.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am agreeing to what the Senator said about the problem and its seriousness, but he and I do not agree at all as to the method by which the problem should be solved.

After the crushing depression of 1921 had wrought its destruction to agriculture, Congress immediately set out to discover some methods of relief. We passed the first emergency tariff act. We revived the War Finance Corporation and placed $500,000,000 at the disposal of the farmers and stock growers of the land. We at that time thought it would be helpful, and greatly helpful, to the agricultural interests of the country. We established intermediate banks of credit and made possible a supply of money to the farmer at reasonable rates and on long terms, so that he could not be forced to rush all of his products to market at once in order to meet his obligations, and thus further depress the price of all he produced.

The present tariff act was written to meet the demands of the friends of agriculture. It is not altogether true that the farmer sells in an open market and buys in a protected market, for a large percentage of all that he uses on his farm or in his home is on the free list, while there is imposed the highest rate on agricultural products coming into this country from other countries that was ever levied by any tariff law in the entire history of tariff making in the United States.

It may be true that those rates are not effective, but nevertheless when we passed them we did so in the best faith and believed they would be adequately protective, because it was a protective-tariff Congress, which believed in the doctrine of protection and in its immediate application to the affairs of the country as they then existed. It has since transpired that we have found that many of those rates are not sufficiently protective, but at the time they were passed they were passed in the best of faith, and the heads of the agricultural interests and industries in the United States represented in the city of Washington indorsed every one of those schedules and at that time said that they would be adequate, and on their recommendation and with their consent we passed the agricultural schedule.

My friend the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] said it is all "bunk." It is not "bunk," by reason of the fact that but for this agricultural schedule and the rates it imposed agriculture in the United States to-day would be infinitely worse off than it is, and I do not think that is a controverted proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator include wheat in that statement?

Mr. WATSON. Part of the time; not now. Of course, that is an unfortunate condition. The condition existing with regard to wheat has not always existed and will not always exist. Circumstances change as production increases or as the demand increases or as the world production increases. There is no question about that. We can not always adequately measure a tariff through the coming ages or centuries or decades by the condition that exists now. We may levy tariff rates now that are adequately protective, but everybody knows that because of changed conditions in industry and agriculture, in production and in consumption, the whole thing may be upset or largely so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator say how the condition as respects wheat differs from a year ago?

Mr. WATSON. I can go into that, but will the Senator wait and let me do it in my own good time?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a question?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator will agree that no tariff is adequate unless it is effective, will he not?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So it is useless to talk of adequate schedules when at the same time we know they have not been able to operate and have never been effective.

Mr. WATSON. My only answer to that is, as I said, that at the time we passed this schedule we thought it would be adequate. We had the best advice in the country on the question and that advice was that it would be adequate.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Did the Senator think it would be effective?

Mr. WATSON. I thought it would be effective, certainly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Has the Senator changed his mind?

Mr. WATSON. I have changed my mind on that point because conditions have forced me to change my mind on the question. I have not any doubt about that now. New conditions have come and I think that we have to meet those new conditions. I have been for two years trying to get a bill passed which, while not dogmatically asserting that it is the only measure that will cure the situation, yet I conscientiously believed that it would, and I still believe it will, if we give it an opportunity to be tried in the United States.

The real problem that confronts the farmer at this time is to maintain the tariff, as I understand it, for all phases of our industry alike. The farmer sells but about 10 per cent abroad of all he produces and about 90 per cent at home. It would be, according to my view, a wicked and wanton policy to destroy the market in which he sells his 90 per cent in order to attempt to increase the 10 per cent, for the whole world is becoming rehabilitated agriculturally, and the competition of all agricultural products abroad will be keener in the days to come than it has been at any time in the past.

Let us remember that the exports of grain and grain-food preparations for 1925 were less than for 1924, and in 1926 were less than they were in 1925. This decline in exports is due to two reasons:

First, the European nations are recovering their agricultural capacity. In reality they are making greater efforts to stimulate agricultural production. They learned in the war that they must make themselves as nearly self-sustaining as possible and to that end must revitalize agriculture in their respective countries. In addition they have learned the necessity of reducing imports in order to help balance their budgets, and thus they are making every effort to raise as much food at home as possibly can be done.

Secondly, it must be remembered that the wheat area in Canada has increased from a pre-war average of 10,000,000 acres to 22,000,000 acres in 1925, while there are still large uncultivated areas in that country suitable for wheat production. A recent report of the Agricultural Department shows that the Australian wheat area has increased from a pre-war average of 7,600,000 acres to 10,800,000 acres. The wheat area in those countries together is now about 53 per cent above pre-war average. New Zealand and Australia have just finished a season in fine shape. The further development of the western Provinces of Canada and the recovery of Europe are adding to the world's supply.

Therefore, I contend that what the farmer wants to do is to enlarge his home market. What the farmer wants is more hungry mouths to feed and more empty stomachs to fill. He wants more men working in the factories and in the mines and in the forests and on the railroads, and he wants them paid the American wage rate, the highest known among men, in order that right at home they can pay the American farmer the best price paid for agricultural products paid anywhere in the broad circle of the earth.

That is the American system of protection, and throughout the years it has worked so marvelously that our country today stands easily first among all the nations of the world in our universal prosperity. I do not say that it is directly the outgrowth of the protective-tariff system alone, but I say that it is largely the result of the protective-tariff system operating through the years, because it is our policy as protectionists to promote production in the country. We believe that production should be unlimited and unhampered; that we should not put it in leading strings. The United States should do everything its resources and its labor, skilled and unskilled, its capital, its inventive genius, will enable it to do, because it is a truism from which there is no escape that if we care for the producer the consumer will be in a position to care for himself.

Furthermore, the report of a survey made by a special commission under direction of the foodstuffs division of the Department of Commerce in 1925 states that only one-tenth of the wheat land of the Argentine and only one-sixth of the wheat land of Canada is at present under cultivation and that virgin soil in each country is being utilized in an increasing quantity each year. This report also points out that, because of cheap land and other cheap production costs, crops and livestock can be produced in these countries at a much lower figure than they can be produced in our country.

Additional evidence is supplied by the report of a special representative of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture covering the livestock industry in the Argentine. This report asserts that, after taking into account all of the cost of production, cattle in the Argentine can be produced for 75 cents per 100 pounds, which is below any possible cost of production in the United States.

We all remember that the Tariff Commission in 1924 submitted to the President its report on the difference in the cost of producing wheat in Canada and in this country; we have discussed it, and I shall not again go into it, but if the tariff on that product be inadequate, then I am in favor of making it adequate. That is why I favor the McNary-Haugen bill.

I do not dogmatically assert that that is the only measure that can produce this result, but I do believe that it will produce it, and I favor it because I think it is the best solution of the problem that yet has been presented to the American Congress, and it is the one solution that has the almost unanimous support of the agricultural interests of the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, when the Senator from Indiana says that if the tariff is inadequate he is in favor of making it adequate, how is he going to do that without doing anything at all?

Mr. WATSON. I will tell the Senator all about that.

Undoubtedly these causes operate to the advantage of the producer of food in these other countries and, undoubtedly, these causes are driving our farmers out of the European market because of the fixed fact that all of these other people are able to undersell him in the world market and yet make a profit.

The National Industrial Conference is an organization of industrialists, financed by capitalists and conducted by men of wealth. Its object is to investigate every phase of American industry and to report its conclusions to the American public. At the beginning of 1925 they employed the finest experts they could command in this land, who put in one whole year investigating the conditions of agriculture in this country as compared with the condition of agriculture in other countries and as compared with other phases of American industry and activity. Those experts have no hesitancy in predicting that the American exports of farm products to foreign markets must rapidly be reduced in the future because of the conditions set forth by these various reports of our governmental agencies and because of conditions which these experts found existing here and elsewhere around the world.

What, then, would be the condition of the American farmer if our whole tariff system were to be abrogated and we at once entered upon a policy of universal free trade?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Was not that the same commission which recommended a reduction in tariff rates, as is suggested in the pending resolution?

Mr. WATSON. The Tariff Commission?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the commission to which the Senator from Indiana is referring.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator states they recommended what?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I refer to the Industrial Conference.

Mr. WATSON. No; I do not think so. That was a special commission, I understand, headed by ex-Secretary of Commerce Nagel, of St. Louis.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; it was the Industrial Conference.

Mr. WATSON. If it was a part of the Industrial Conference, I do not recall it. I think it was especially appointed. I do not think it was a part of the Industrial Conference. It was appointed by the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was the Industrial Conference that recommended as one of the measures for relief a reduction of tariff rates, exactly as is suggested in the resolution under consideration.

Mr. WATSON. The pending resolution does not suggest any rates, I will say to my friend from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will put the report to which I refer in the RECORD.

Mr. WATSON. I know what the recommendation is, but I did not agree with it, and do not agree with it now. I can not understand it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator, however, was quoting from it.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is why I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. I may quote many things from my friend from Montana that I believe, and others that I do not believe, because we do not concur, that is all; although I know he is honest in making any statement. But the point about it is that they recommended that the tariff be lowered in order to help agriculture. To my mind that is an unthinkable proposition. If the tariff schedules generally be lowered very much, if the American laboring man is interfered with, if he is driven out of business in any great number, if his capacity to buy is limited or curtailed, then we should not help the agriculture of the United States. We should strike down agriculture in this country in that proportion and to that degree. I do not think there is a doubt about that in the world. It has been demonstrated over and over again. That is why I can not agree with my friend from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER]. He does not say what schedules he proposes to revise; he does not say how much he proposed to revise them; he does not say anything about revising them in accordance with the protective tariff idea so as to measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. He does not say that the American market is to be preserved either for the American farmer or for the American manufacturer. Therefore, I am not in favor of this resolution.

Mr. MCMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. MCMASTER. Most assuredly it is absurd to introduce a resolution for tariff reduction enumerating exactly the schedules which ought to be changed, stating specifically what the rates ought to be. If I have not any better reason for presenting the resolution in its present form I have the platform of the Republican Party of 1908, in which that party went on record in favor of a revision of the schedules downward but did not specify a single schedule that ought to be reduced. No one would think of introducing a resolution or entering into an arrangement of that kind specifying the schedules. It is a question that ought to come up for consideration by the Congress and be thoroughly threshed out.

It seems to me the distinguished Senator from Indiana ought not to expect, and does not expect, a resolution of that kind to go into detail, even though he were in favor of it.

Mr. WATSON. That is the very reason I am against this resolution.

Mr. McMASTER. And in addition, I wish to say to my distinguished friend the Senator from Indiana that if I were going to vote against the resolution I would do exactly what he proposes to do, only in that case I would take up the aluminum schedule and would demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Senate that that schedule was just, that it was necessary, that all the excess profits accorded the industry are a good thing for the country at large. So I would take up the dye and chemical schedules and I would go through all the schedules. I would search through the profits accounts of certain corporations engaged in those businesses, which are making enormous profits, and then I would justify my position that those schedules ought to be maintained and preserved for the purpose of permitting that condition to continue.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I do not believe that a general resolution of this kind adopted by this body can at all be effective in helping the farmer or helping agriculture or promoting industry in the United States. I can not get it into my mind that any such result will occur, and, because of that fact, I can not support it.

Mr. President, the last tariff for revenue bill placed all farm products, grains, vegetables, all fruits except a few grown exclusively in the South, sugar, fresh meats and meat animals, dairy products, poultry, eggs, and wool on the free list. Please do not forget that the object of a tariff for revenue is to produce revenue, and that in order to produce revenue there must be a tremendous volume of imports from abroad or else revenue will not be produced and that policy would thus fail in the very object of its adoption. Please bear in mind also that whenever we buy articles made abroad we do not buy articles made in the United States and thereby to that extent destroy the ability of the people to buy. This is precisely what followed the tariff act to which I have just referred. During the first 12 months of the operation of that law there were imported into this country grains, potatoes, hay, butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, meat, cattle, horses, sheep, and wool from Canada; butter, cheese, and eggs from Europe; eggs in vast quantities from China; cattle, fresh meats, wool, and hides from South America and Australia; in total value of $350,000,000 more than the aggregate importations of like products during the entire preceding tariff administration.

I call the attention of my friend from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER] to the fact that we can not hope to reduce the tariff on manufactured products, and at the same time raise the tariff on agricultural products unless there be reason and justification for doing it. I am in favor of increasing rates on certain agricultural products as I have studied them; I might vote in favor of reducing the rates on manufactured products in certain schedules, but I am not one of those who believe that we can pull down industry and at the same time lift up agriculture by striking down below a just normal or medium the rates on manufactured products and raising them above that medium on agricultural products. I may say that this is one country; that agriculture and industry must go side by side; that we must have one law in the United States, and we can not aid and lift up agriculture at the expense of industry and then accomplish what we start out to do for agriculture. Is not that just as plain as that two and two make four?

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I yield first to my friend on this side, and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana what it was that pulled down 177,000 corporations in the United States with a $2,000,000,000 loss a year for five years?

Mr. WATSON. I will say to my friend that that is partly due to low tariff rates on importations.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yet the Senator does not want to do anything about the tariff until after the election.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, well, we are all right; we will do it after the election, and do it in good time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I assume that the Senator is making the contention—and I do not say this by way of facetiousness—that the tariff increases the price of the domestic product which is protected by the tariff. Starting out with that assumption, it is obvious then that the Senator believes that the maintenance of the tariff is necessary in order to increase prices. If the maintenance of the tariff increases the prices of manufactured articles and of all commodities affected by the tariff, obviously to the farmers it means an increase in the cost of the things which they must buy. If, therefore, the tariff were reduced, would it not follow that there would be a reduction in the price of commodities, and if there were a reduction in the price of commodities purchased by the farmer does not the Senator believe that that would be advantageous to the farmer?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I will say to my friend that that is the old tariff-for-revenue argument which has been used ever since the foundation of the Government; that the tariff is a tax; that it is imposed upon imports and that the people pay the tax. The truth about it is that we have had that argument put forth in Democratic campaigns over and over again, that the tariff is a tax; we have heard it ad libitum, and ad nauseum. Now, let me say this to my friend——

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will pardon me, let me say that after a tariff is imposed, if there be no competition in the United States in the particular commodity, the tariff is a tax; it is added to the price, and the people have to pay it; but that condition exists only for a short time; that condition obtains only until that industry can establish itself in the United States, when competition among those producing that very article in the United States tends to bring the price down to where it ought to be, to where the law of supply and demand operates. I could illustrate by citing any number of articles, if I cared to do so, but it is far afield from what I am trying to say at this time, and I do not wish to be diverted. However, I might mention, for instance, tin plate; I might mention pearl buttons, or the wool schedule, or the cotton schedule, or the iron and steel schedules, and show that at the time tariff rates first were imposed, and for a short while thereafter, there was an increase in prices, but after the industry became thoroughly established in the United States the competition at home, the domestic competition, cut the prices down to about where they ought to be and where the law of supply and demand operated. Then the danger is that the tariff, which made possible this growth and development, may be torn down; that the laboring men in American institutions may be brought into direct competition with laboring people abroad, who receive from one-third to one-half as much as do the operatives in American industries, and that those industries may be destroyed or closed down, until the sky is clear, and until the protective tariff policy is once more reestablished in the United States. That has happened six times in the United States.

Every time we have changed the tariff it has been invariably accompanied by commercial depression and industrial disaster. The only way in which we have ever gotten out of it has been by the reestablishment of the protective tariff as the policy of the Nation, which again has caused capital to be reinvested and labor to be reemployed and brought prosperity back once more to the people of the United States. That is not "political bunk," as my friend from Arkansas might say; that is irrefutable history which no man may successfully dispute.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator insist that this prosperity applies to the farmers of the United States, and also to the 40 per cent of corporations which are operating at a loss?

Mr. WATSON. Oh, I have said to my friend time and again that I agreed thoroughly with him about the position of agriculture in the United States. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not like to hear this "prosperity" talk when it applies only to a third of the people of the United States.

Mr. WATSON. I have not said a word about prosperity—not a word. I have been describing the conditions that exist; and I am saying to my friend now, if he will permit me to use an ordinary street expression, that if he pulls down the tariff on industry he will saw off the limb he is sitting on, and saw it off next to the tree, and great will be the fall thereof.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there, pursuing this thought that the tariff is a tax in the early stages of its imposition, and afterwards manufacturers get on their feet and compete with each other? That is a very pretty theory; but is it not the actual experience that the manufacturers who have been built up as a special privilege by reason of this tax then get together and form a trust or monopoly, and control the price of the product?

Mr. WATSON. That is not the fault of the tariff. That is the fault of other laws. We have passed laws against that sort of thing in the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WATSON. Just a minute, please. Let me make the ad hominem argument to my friend from Florida. I notice that when the tariff is up he is entirely willing to vote a tariff on citrus fruits coming into this country from other countries, and on tomatoes, and on other things produced in Florida. My friend has great anxiety to protect the particular things produced in his own State, while he believes in free trade for all the remainder of the Republic. Is that fair?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is not quite accurate, either. I never have believed in free trade.

Mr. WATSON. Pretty close to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I never have believed in free trade, and I contend that there should be a tariff. My thought in that connection is that the only duty I have ever asked, either on citrus fruits or on tomatoes, is a revenue-producing duty. Then, again, I may say to the Senator that citrus fruits are not an absolute necessity anyhow. They are more in the nature of a luxury than a necessity.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. Yes. Here is another citrus-fruit man. We will listen to him.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I recall with great pleasure the masterly argument made by the distinguished Senator from Florida in support of his amendment to the tariff bill increasing the tariff duty from one-half cent to 1 cent a pound on grapefruit. The Senator argued persuasively and convincingly that there was a pressing, vital necessity for that increase. I joined with him, and the rates were raised, and are now 1 cent per pound on grapefruit.

Mr. WATSON. And everybody is happy.

RENEWED EVIDENCE

Mr. President, in 1921 a Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry was established, consisting of Members of Congress, representing both the Senate and the House, and both political parties. It made a report announcing its conclusions as a result of all its investigations in response to a resolution passed by Congress. In order that you may have a just idea of the fairness and representative character of this commission, I give the names of its personnel: Senators CAPPER of Kansas, LENROOT of Wisconsin, and MCNARY of Oregon, Republicans; Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas, the Democratic leader, and Senator HARRISON of Mississippi, Democrats; Representatives ANDERSON of Minnesota, MILLS of New York, and FUNK of Illinois, Republicans; and SUMMERS of Texas and TEN EYCK of New York, Democrats. Therefore, there can not be charged any partisanship or effort to play politics against this committee or its report.

Their conclusions were signed by all of the Members, without a single exception, and very clearly announced that as an invariable rule exports of farm products have very little to do with domestic farm prices, but that on the other hand there is the closest possible relationship between farm prices and domestic consumption; and, further, that the history of farm prices in our country justifies the statement that industrial depressions in the United States are always accompanied by a decline in farm prices, simply because industrial depression means lessened domestic consumption.

Every farmer knows these facts to be true, and can easily prove it to any doubter by referring to the figures of 1921, in which year we exported $2,607,641,000 worth of agricultural products, or a greater quantity than in any other peace year in the entire history of the Nation; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, 1921 was the year in which the agricultural structure of the country collapsed, and left our farmers in the most distressing condition they have ever known. The reason was that 5,000,000 men were out of employment, that their capacity to buy was largely curtailed, and, in addition to that, cheap agricultural products were coming into this country from elsewhere about the world. The emergency tariff checked the one, and the McCumber tariff checked the other; and since that time agricultural products have steadily increased in price, though they have not yet reached the level to which they should go if agriculture is to be placed on a parity with industry in the United States.

THE M'NARY BILL

And how is that task to be accomplished? Many of us sought to bring it about by the passage of the so-called McNary bill through the Senate. The object of this legislation was to secure a greater degree of stability in the price levels of corn, wheat, hogs, and cotton in this country. We proposed to do it by placing at the disposal of the producers a mechanism with the assistance of which they could control the handling and marketing of crop surpluses, thereby preventing price fluctuations and securing in domestic markets the price benefits of the protective tariff.

Secretary Mellon in his celebrated letter correctly states one principle, as follows:

> Farming differs from most industries in that the output largely fixes the price, whereas in manufacturing price largely controls the output.

In other words, by reason of closely organized and effective methods, the manufacturers of any given product are in a position to determine about what the demand for that product will be for the ensuing year and to regulate production accordingly. The farmer is in no such favorable position. There are six and one-half millions of them in the United States, and there is no possible way in which they can be organized so as to fix the quantity of the production of any crop, and even if they could definitely arrange to have a certain number of acres planted, for instance, to wheat, no human foresight could possibly determine the amount of wheat that could be produced on that fixed number of acres. As an illustration, no prophetic insight could possibly have foretold six months ago the amount of wheat that would be produced in Indiana this year, for the quantity and quality alike surprised everybody; and the same thing is substantially true of every year of every product.

Because of this fact we sought to set up a mechanism that, through the operation of a governmental agency, would enable the farmer to do what the manufacturer does, and which manufacturers by reason of their limited number can do, and which farmers by reason of their great numbers can not do.

If farmers could be compactly organized for the purpose of cooperative marketing, the whole problem would be solved, for production might at least be partially regulated and products could be fed into the market at such a rate as to hold up the price; but at the present time that is not possible, though one of the very objects of the McNary bill was to aid in making cooperative marketing effective.

THE SURPLUS

Notwithstanding all that has been done for the farmer in the way of legislation, there is one other thing that must needs be done, and that is to make arrangements by legislation to take care of his surplus product, for any solution of the farm problem that does not take into consideration the disposition of the surplus must of necessity fall far short of the mark.

Opposition to this measure was twofold; first, to the aim itself; secondly, to the means proposed by the bill.

The aim of this legislation is to prevent relatively small annual surpluses above domestic requirements from depressing the prices of the whole crop below the cost of production. It is only when the producer must offer his surplus in the competition of the world market that he is forced to take the price determined by the world supply of any given crop. As to such a crop the protective tariff affords slight relief, because the producer becomes the victim of world supply and world demand. If the world produces a large surplus of any crop, that surplus fixes the price for the whole crop. If there be a great world surplus of any crop, the protective tariff will keep the domestic price above the world price and at the top of the tariff wall only in case the domestic crop is about sufficient for domestic consumption; but if there is not only a large world surplus but a large domestic surplus protective tariffs can not possibly raise the domestic price.

For instance, let us suppose that we produce 650,000,000 bushels of wheat and consume 650,000,000 bushels at home, and further, that there is no large world surplus of wheat. Then the surplus sold abroad would not depress the price of the domestic supply sold at home, and this might possibly be true even without a tariff, but only if there were no world surplus.

On the other hand, let us suppose that we produce 700,000,000 bushels and consume 600,000,000 bushels at home and that at the same time there is a large world surplus. Then the world price obtained for the 100,000,000-bushel surplus sold abroad undoubtedly fixes the price of the 600,000,000 bushels sold at home, and the tariff is of little or no avail to change the result.

Therefore in the McNary bill we sought to set up a mechanism that would be able to determine as far as is humanly possible about what the surplus would be, if any, here and in the competing countries of the world and then to buy up and take off of the market that surplus, thereby enabling the American supply to just about meet the American demand; in which case no living human being can deny that the tariff would be effective and that the price of the domestic product would be lifted to the top of the tariff wall.

Under the provisions of this bill the surplus bought up by those in control of this device could be fed into the world market at the most favorable times and under the most favorable conditions to get the largest possible price out of it, and then whatever loss might be suffered by its sale abroad at the world price could be collected, and under the terms of the bill was to be collected, from all the producers of wheat in the country, the collection to be made from the first processor.

No one disputes that American farm costs of production are higher than those in other countries of the world; and, further, no one can gainsay that legislation creating artificial conditions largely made and keeps them so. Protective tariffs make and maintain higher wages; higher wages make higher costs for all that the farmer buys; our immigration laws shut out labor from other lands, and the demand for labor in this country increases the cost of labor to the farmer. The Adamson law fixed eight hours as the standard day's labor on all railroads, and this became the standard in all industry, thus adding to the production cost of what the farmer buys. True, this high-priced labor furnishes a market for the farmer and enhances the prices of his products; but unless his surplus crop be taken care of in the same artificial way, he does not get the full benefit of the industrial prosperity produced by this artificial legislation. Our entire national policy has been to build up our farm production on a surplus basis, and because of this surplus our prices, both at home and abroad, are determined by foreign rather than by domestic costs. Therefore the tariff is not effective for the farmer on these surplus crops, and the problem that confronts us is to make it so.

THE PROBLEM STATED

The surplus can be controlled in one of two ways: First, by eliminating 25 per cent of the farmers and forcing them into the cities because of their inability to make substantial profits on the farm; secondly, by handling by artificial means, aided by the Government, the surplus, thus enabling the farmer to make a profit on his production. Our opponents do not argue that we should cease producing food for export, but what they do squarely say is that we must sell our farm products at home at the same price that foreign labor pays. That has been repeated over and over again until it may be said to be the announced policy of the opponents of any plan to raise farm prices in America. In other words, the tariff must not be permitted to work to equalize the differences in production costs on farm crops between the United States farmer and his low-standard competitor abroad.

I do not believe this is a tenable position for an advocate of the doctrine of protection, of whom I am one, to take, and I ask my friends to bear in mind that the maximum difference between the price abroad and the price at home, whether under any proposed legislation or because of a shortage in production that makes the tariff effective, would be the tariff itself, and that difference would still exist if we lessened our production so that there was a domestic shortage. In that event the logic of our opponents would unquestionably lead them to advocate a repeal of all agricultural tariffs, because, if they are effective, they would maintain an American price for the American farmer above that which foreign labor has to pay.

OUR OPPONENTS' ARGUMENT

Their contention can only mean that they are opposed to a tariff that works for the farmer. In other words, they advocate for America the same step toward industrialization of the Nation at the expense of agriculture that was taken in England in 1846. And if we continue to drive the farmers from the farm into the city, until there comes a time when the urban population greatly dominates and overwhelms the rural population, and the price of agricultural products is enhanced because of that fact, with lessened production and an increase of consumption, then those in the city having the vote will insist on absolute free trade in our agricultural products, just as they did in England in 1846, and, in my judgment, that is the situation that to-day confronts American agriculture. That is why I plead with my protective tariff friends, whether it be in the East or in the West, to help us solve this agricultural problem, to put agriculture on a sound basis, protect it as we must protect it by the protective tariff, and if the tariff be not sufficiently protective, then by some other agency that may make the tariff effective.

THE M'NARY-HAUGEN THEORY STATED

I am one protectionist who believes that the wheat tariff, for example, was imposed for the express purpose of enabling the farmer to obtain a higher price for his product than that obtained by his foreign competitor in wheat production, the price to equalize the difference between his production costs and those of his competitor abroad. The very object of the tariff is to give the American producer an increased price over his foreign competitor. That was the aim of the McNary bill, for it simply supplemented the tariff, making it effective wherein, because of surplus crops, it would be ineffective. Our opponents frankly admit that it would have this effect, but state that it ought not to be done because it would cause foreign labor to pay more for American crops than American labor would be compelled to pay, and thus subsidize them to that extent.

But our friends are opposed to the aim itself. They say that, if you make the tariff effective for the farmer by legislation of this kind, you will raise the cost of living in this country. But any scheme of any kind that might be adopted to make the tariff effective would do precisely the same thing in an exactly equal degree. Any step, voluntarily taken by the farmer, or induced by govermental aid, that would secure a fair price to the farmer would do exactly the same thing, namely, enhance the price. So what our friends oppose when they raise the cost of living argument is really a profit for the farmer, no matter what causes it or what steps are taken to produce it.

I call attention to the fact that the American Federation of Labor takes no such position. Its representatives testified that they wanted the farmer to get a fair price; that they were satisfied that a great many farmers were not producing their crops at a profit, and that they did not want anyone in the United States to work for less than a living and saving wage. Furthermore, they are aware of the fact that almost 1,000,000 farmers a year are driven from the farms to the cities to compete with labor, thus reducing the number of producers and at the same time enhancing the force that competes with them for their jobs.

FURTHER OPPOSITION

Our friends argue that we should not do anything that will cause our workmen to pay more for what they buy than the foreign workman pays. As an industrial high protectionist I could not without inconsistency support that position. If our friends mean that we are to maintain an industrial organization that can compete for world trade at the expense of our farmers by compelling the farmer to sell at home at the foreign price, then I must part company with them, for I believe that the protective tariff should be made to apply to all phases of American industry alike.

Our friends complain that by this scheme we sell wheat, for instance, abroad cheaper than at home, and that that should not be permitted. But these same gentlemen were advocates of the Edge bill, by which all sorts of industrial concerns are permitted to combine, without being subject to the operations of antitrust laws, for the very purpose of selling their products abroad cheaper than at home. That law is in operation and results in what I believe great good to the country, but if this plan is applied to the products of the factory, why may it not with equal force and equal intelligence be applied to the products of the farm? Undoubtedly it can be and it should be, and this cry of selling abroad cheaper than at home can be set up against almost every industrial institution in the land. Notwithstanding their foresight and their ability and their power to organize and their knowledge of world conditions, the manufacturers of any given product may have a surplus they do sell abroad cheaper than at home in order that they may maintain the integrity of their organizations and keep their factories at work. This is entirely feasible, and should not be objected to by any reasonable man.

Furthermore, our opponents say that if our proposed legislation secures a better price for the farmer it would tend to stimulate production and to reduce consumption. If that be true of the price increase secured under legislation we propose, it is true of any price increase; for instance, one secured by cooperative marketing. The dominant idea in that argument is that there must be no increase in farm income because such an increase would be followed by a corresponding increase in farm production. If this is an argument against our proposed legislation it is also an argument against any attempt to improve farm prices by voluntary action of individual farmers in reducing acreage, or by voluntary efforts of farmers through cooperative marketing.

There is much more reason to become alarmed over the downward trend in agriculture than to fear for its considerable expansion. You may find food for thought in the fact that wheat acreage in 1925 was 389,000 acres less than it was in 1899, although the population during that period had increased from 74,000,000 to 112,000,000.

As for the effect of price on consumption, I need but state that the figures conclusively prove that the per capita consumption of wheat has decreased 25 per cent during a period when the purchasing power of labor was the highest in the history of the Nation and the exchange value of wheat the lowest. Our opponents say in effect that the American public must get its food at the same price as Europe and Asia, but, with the others who supported the McNary bill, I maintain that the American public is willing to pay the American farmer a protected American price for what he produces, and that is all he demands.

OTHER FALLACIOUS ARGUMENTS

There are those who contend that we should equalize the farmer and the manufacturer by pulling the manufacturer down rather than by lifting the farmer up. The farmer himself might be attracted to that argument of cheaper prices all around, his own included, if he were out of debt. But the incumbrance, which amounted to but $4,000,000,000 in 1910, had climbed up to $12,500,000,000 in 1920, and is still higher to-day.

The Census Bureau, which is completing its 1925 farm census, shows that the 17 States whose figures are tabulated have increased their farm mortgage indebtedness $323,000,000 since 1920 and the value of the mortgaged land in the same time dropped off over $1,000,000,000, so that the ratio of farm debt to land values had jumped from 28 per cent in 1920 to 43 per cent in 1925.

The farmer is entitled to a chance to pay that debt with a product high in dollar value, and he wants to be equalized up, not down. The remedy proposed by the Senator from South Dakota would, if effective, be equivalent to multiplying the size of the farm debt instead of aiding the farmer to pay it.

I am just as much in favor of adequate legislation to help the farmer as my friends dare be—or as anybody else dare be—because I realize that the one great overwhelming problem that to-day confronts the American people is the rehabilitation of American agriculture in the United States of America.

ANOTHER OBJECTION

Other objectors take the position that the equalization fee proposed in the McNary bill would be passed on to the consumer. In fact, the ultimate increase in price to the consumer would be the tariff, out of which the fee is deducted from the farmer's price. The farmer is entitled to the full benefit of the tariff, and yet he is willing himself to deduct the equalization fee from the amount he is to receive if he sells his product up to the top of the tariff wall. If the farmer could so easily pass on his cost to the consumer, he would not be seeking legislation or artificial means to enable him to obtain a fair price.

There are those who, contrary to all the facts, continue to state that the Government makes some guarantee against loss to the farmers by the provisions of the McNary bill, when, in truth and in fact, there is no guarantee provision whatever in any way.

Those who oppose this measure prophesy increased production and decreased consumption and then wind up with the sweeping statement that, if a plan of this kind can be applied to farm products, why can it not be applied to all other products. The simple truth is that the textile people and the shoe manufacturers have done everything they knew to secure the passage of legislation that fits their particular case, and I think justifiably so. Surely our friends are not serious when they compare such industries, with their accurate control over output and their ability to shut down without continuing high costs or plant disintegration, with the farmers who have none of these advantages.

COOPERATIVE MARKETING

I am a believer in cooperative marketing, but it will be a long time before it can be made to work successfully over the whole country. The number of persons involved, the complexity of details, the difficulty in controlling the members, and the almost insuperable task of agreeing on the subjects to be operated on and the costs of operation all work together to break down the scheme, and this is all the more so when applied to commodities which compete with world markets.

My own thought is, that so far as this plan relates to agriculture, it is purely a marketing one and can not become a production-controlling scheme. On a nation-wide scale its purpose necessarily will be confined to determining when and how to market crops, what crops shall be included, and to prevent speculation, and in what manner the middleman shall be dealt with. When it comes to a national crop that is just ample to supply the home demand, no artifice of any kind is necessary. The law of supply and demand gives to the producer a profitable return under those conditions, and the object of the McNary plan is to withhold the surplus of any given crop from the market so that the law of supply and demand will operate, but on a higher level—namely, on a level equal with the top of the tariff wall.

This is not price fixing any more than the tariff is price fixing. For instance, we placed a tariff of 30 cents a bushel on wheat, the Tariff Commission found that the difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada is 42 cents a bushel, and the President raised the tariff to 42 cents. There are those among us who maintain that that is price fixing, but it is not, it is simply an effort to control world movement of a particular product so as to give American producers the benefit of higher general prices.

The American agricultural producers know what their own experience is in these respects, and I do not believe that the great body of our agricultural friends expect that the tariff rates will be lowered immediately, knowing just what that means in a legislative body.

ENGLAND'S EXAMPLE

In 1846 English statesmen came to the conclusion that that country could not produce a sufficient food supply for her great industrial population, and therefore adopted a policy of unrestricted free trade in all products of the farm, which policy it has since religiously maintained. The opponents of artificial legislation in this country might do well to consider the English example when they assert that a sufficient number of farmers should leave the farms to render farming profitable to those who remain, for England furnishes a striking example of the fallacy of this argument.

Notwithstanding the great urban population of England, no farmer can make a real living in that country. Notwithstanding his proximity to the great market, he is simply kept out of a profitable business by the cheap products of agriculture that come from all other parts of the world.

The same can happen to us in very large degree. Moreover, it must be remembered that there are now four times as many people who want cheap food as there are people who want high prices for farm products, and as this proportion increases, it will finally mean such a preponderant consuming population that they will vote free trade in agricultural products in order to secure cheaper food, thus subjecting whatever agricultural industry may remain to unlimited imports of farm products from all those countries in which it is so cheaply produced that no farmer in this country can compete and live.

CONCLUSION

Hitherto, our working folk in the city have been perpetually revirilized and revitalized by the working folk from the country. The farm has furnished a good part of the backbone and sinew of the Republic; its moral strength, its conservatism, a check on the frequent and volcanic eruptions of the less staple portion of our people, and it is a wholesome influence in our entire national life. It would be an unspeakable calamity to strike all of this out of our civilization and to abandon utterly all of those strengthening and sustaining virtues that abound on the farm.

Therefore, let us accommodate ourselves to present conditions to the extent of utilizing our national policy in behalf of the farmer as well as in behalf of industry and labor. That is the true American policy. From it we have not departed in the past, and it has brought us to our present unrivaled position among the people of the world. From it we should not depart in the future, and it will lead us to still greater heights of conquest and achievement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the discussion of the resolution has taken a broader field than the mere import of the resolution itself would seem to justify. In the latter moments of the discussion by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] the question has presented itself in the form of whether or not we shall tear down the industries or raise agriculture up to the level of the prosperity of the industries. I do not hesitate to say that if it were possible to give agriculture the profits which are taken by the Steel Trust, which are taken by the Aluminum Trust, which are taken by the big combinations of capital, I would subscribe to that doctrine. But the Department of Commerce shows that the whole American production increases our national wealth only 5½ per cent a year. All of the work of all of our people, all of the earnings of all our capital, all the increase of property values, the unearned increment, and even the depreciation of the dollar added together from 1912 to 1922, increase our national wealth only by 5½ per cent a year.

Five and one-half per cent, then, is what we have to distribute in our country. That is what we have to divide out to the farmers and to all of the industrial enterprises. When a portion of the industrial enterprises take a greater share than 5½ per cent, somebody else must take less than 5½ per cent or the average would not remain. Therefore it is an absolute impossibility to equalize agriculture with these other things. The excess profits must be brought down.

I have pointed out that 177,000 corporations in the United States have operated at a loss for the last five years, and that loss has been an enormous amount, an average of almost $2,000,000,000 a year. There is some equalization needed to give prosperity to this large portion, over 40 per cent, of the corporations of the United States, as well as 90 per cent of the farmers of the United States, who are at the verge of bankruptcy at this moment.

Our mortgage indebtedness has enormously increased and our foreclosures of mortgages, which reduced the mortgage indebtedness, have enormously increased. Our land values have declined some $20,000,000. Everything has gone backward with agriculture and it is impossible to give agriculture equality without transferring some of the profits of the great combinations in our economic arrangement so that agriculture will reap their benefit.

Now let us see about manufacturing as a whole in the United States. Even since deflation there is about $60,000,000,000 of capital invested in agriculture. There are about 12,000,000 workers on the farms of the United States; that is, men who make a hand on the farm. That does not count the women and children who work the year around on the farms. That $60,000,000,000 and 12,000,000 of workers produce and have produced during the last five years a gross return or revenue of about $12,000,000,000.

How is it in manufacturing, in the protected and patented industries? There is about $40,000,000,000 of capital, in round numbers, invested in manufacturing, perhaps a little more, but not much. There are fewer than 9,000,000 workers in the industries of the United States, 8,778,000 being the exact figures when I last checked them. But this smaller amount of capital and smaller amount of workers, only two-thirds as much capital and only three-fourths as many workers, produces a gross value of $60,000,000,000.

I might say that the comparison is not exactly fair on these figures because the raw material bill of the manufacturers is greater than the raw material bill of the farmers. But the farmers of the United States must expend 27 per cent of all their production as raw material—that is, feed, seed, work animals and breeding animals, and things that must remain on the farm permanently and continuously—in order to operate the farm.

It would be charged to the raw material account of the manufacturer. But at that there is still a greater percentage of raw material in manufacture, so I deduct $16,000,000,000 for that item and it still leaves $44,000,000,000 of production for the manufacturers of the United States as against $12,000,000,000 for the farmers, and that on two-thirds as much capital with three-fourths as many workers.

What chance for prosperity does the farmer of the United States have, these 12,000,000 farmers with their $60,000,000,000 of capital, when they bring their products for exchange into these manufactured products and must meet a gross value of five times their own produced by two-thirds as much capital and three-fourths as many workers? There can be no prosperity under that condition.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] indicated that the cause of the high prices of manufactured products is the high wages of labor. Always when arguing against the position of the farmer the cause of his troubles is figured out to be the high wages of labor. But I added up the wages of the 9,000,000 workers in the industries of the United States, as reported by the Department of Labor, and their whole wages amounted to only about $11,000,000,000. They receive actually less than 25 per cent of the gross production of the manufacturers of the United States.

I do not attribute all of this high value of manufactures in the United States to the tariff. I only attribute about one-half of the excess profits to the tariff and, perhaps, the other half is due to patent laws. I have tried to figure out a proportion of the causes of this great discrimination against agriculture. I think probably protective industries are only about one-eighth, on my own estimate, and, perhaps, patented industries about another one-eighth. I think that other laws, however, and other acts of Congress have contributed to produce the balance of this great discrimination.

Here we have the transportation act, passed by the Congress of the United States, and that act fixed the value upon the railroads of the United States by operation of law at, in round numbers, $19,000,000,000 at the moment when they could have been bought on the stock-exchange market for less than $12,000,000,000, adding $7,000,000,000 of fictitious value legalized under that transportation law.

Then there was put in the law a guarantee for a return, a command to the Interstate Commerce Commission to allow a return of 5¾ per cent upon that fictitious value. Five and three-fourths per cent is more than the American people on an average can produce. If all the production of all this country went to capital alone and labor got none of it, it would amount to only 5½ per cent. With 5¾ per cent upon $19,000,000,000 of value, when the actual value, the market value, is only $12,000,000,000, it means over 9 per cent upon the actual value of the railroads.

That is one of the items which has produced this discrimination against agriculture in the United States. That is one of the reasons why the farmers of the United States must take 15 or 20 cents a bushel less, and did take 15 or 20 cents a bushel less, for the wheat they produced in this country this year than did the farmers of Canada, all traceable to the difference in freight rates to reach the markets of the world where the price of both productions was fixed.

Again, the Senator from Indiana mentioned the War Finance Corporation which came to the aid of the farmers of the United States. Then we had the Federal reserve bank law enacted by the Congress of the United States. For the purpose of comparison, before the War Finance Corporation and the Federal reserve bank law came along, for 55 years in my State of Iowa we had twice as many banks as the State of Massachusetts, and they operated on less than one-half as much capital per bank as did the banks of Massachusetts.

We had fewer failures than among the banks in the State of Massachusetts. Then we were given the War Finance Corporation to help us out, and a "decoy duck" was placed at the head of it. Then we were given the Federal reserve bank to help us out, and since then our bank failures in Iowa have been eighteen times as many as in the State of Massachusetts.

I think, perhaps, about 10 or 15 per cent of our trouble is due to excess railroad rates. I think 60 or 65 per cent of the present situation is due to that manipulation of credits in the Federal reserve bank which caused the deflation of the farmers of the United States, and then the high cost of credits which compels the farmer to pay a high rate of interest for his bank loans while speculation in New York gets almost $4,000,000,000 at this moment at 4 per cent interest. Added to the tariff, added to the patent laws, those things have produced this great discrimination against agriculture. But, as I have stated, 12½ per cent of our trouble is due to the excess profits charged the farmer for what he buys because of exorbitant tariff schedules. Therefore in order to equalize this discrimination I stand for a reduction of those tariff schedules.

I believe also that some of the farm schedules are too low. There is a rule which is accepted, at least by all factions of the Republican Party, as the basis for tariff schedules, and that is the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. I do not believe that rule has been followed in any reasonable degree whatsoever. I think that failure to follow it has produced the excess profits that have piled up the millions, indeed the billions of dollars of stock dividends in the United States.

All of that has put a charge upon agriculture that it can not bear.

I think that is the direct issue involved in the pending resolution here to-day. I think it is important to the extent, at least, of 12½ per cent of the farmer's trouble that we reduce the tariff schedules and thereby reduce the excess profits which the farmer must pay.

If along with that we find that there are five or six hundred million dollars worth of agricultural products imported into the United States free—as there are—and a large part of those products could be produced at a reasonable cost in the United States, it is only just and reasonable that tariff duties be imposed in order to protect those farm products.

Take the rate on wheat, for instance, which is 42 cents a bushel at this time. The duty has been raised to that amount; the President has exercised his authority in regard to wheat, and has raised the duty to 42 cents. However, there is a 20-cent difference, or about that, in freight rates to reach the foreign market from the points of production in the United States, our freight rates being that much greater than the freight rates in Canada. Therefore one-half, or about that, of the tariff protection is at once nullified by the high railroad rates in the United States. I think all agricultural products are suffering from a like discrimination in railroad rates. I think everywhere that is true. It is proven in the case of wheat because we have the parallel markets on opposite sides of the Canadian line that prove it beyond question. It is further proven by the fact that the discrimination in wheat prices at Winnipeg and at Minneapolis prior to the 12th of September was about 12 or 15 cents a bushel in favor of Winnipeg, but since the 12th of September the price of wheat has jumped to 20 or 25 cents a bushel more at Winnipeg than at Minneapolis.

What happened on the 12th of September? On that date the Canadian Railway Commission, in one of the most comprehensive decisions ever handed down in any country, reduced the railroad rates on wheat 8 or 10 cents a bushel. Immediately the wheat in Canada advanced by about that amount, and the spread became about that much greater between the Canadian price and the American price.

Mr. President, this situation must be met not by a fight at one point along the line but by a fight all along the line. I am in this fight for agriculture against every excess profit in industry that agriculture is compelled to pay because of tariff schedules; against every excess profit in industry that agriculture is compelled to pay because of patent laws; against every excess interest charge that agriculture is compelled to pay because of banking laws and a banking system which gives a low rate of interest to stock speculators, while agriculture must pay high rates; against every excess charge that agriculture must pay in railroad rates that are fixed by a law of the Congress of the United States.

The Republican Party promised agriculture equality. Its platform is too plain to doubt its construction. What has become of that promise? Even the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who defends the Republican organization, right or wrong, admitted that that pledge had not been kept. Almost four years have now passed, and the Republican machine wants to continue the matter over until after another election, to make another pledge that will get the farmer vote, and then the present situation can be safely continued for another four years.

Unless it keeps its pledges the Republican Party ought to be defeated in the next election. I shall vote for the pending resolution. I shall vote to remove this tariff inequality, and I shall vote to remove every one of these inequalities against agriculture.

Equality is the basic principle of Americanism; it was written into the Declaration of Independence in the beginning; but it has been nullified by selfish interests throughout all our history. The time has come when inequality has grown so great against agriculture that it stands out to-day as the greatest problem of our Republic save and except the problem of human slavery.

TRADE BARRIERS AND CUSTOMS DUTIES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an address recently delivered by Mr. Norman H. Davis on the subject of trade barriers and customs duties.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Artificial restraints on international commerce are not new. Governments have always claimed that it was an undisputed prerogative of sovereignty to establish the terms on which aliens could trade within or across their frontiers. The Moorish corsairs of El Tarifa, near Gibraltar, levying a tax on all commerce through the straits, gave their name to a practice which was very, very old.

In modern times tariffs have been imposed not only to raise revenue, but to protect home industry from foreign competition. Theoretically, such "protection" is a subsidy to local producers, which must be paid for in higher prices by local consumers. There are, however, great practical difficulties in reaching any definite appraisal of the amount of this subsidy, who pays it, and the effect on the economic life of the nation.

The prosperity or adversity of a country is due to multiple and complex causes, of which tariff policy is only one. The size of the home market; the natural resources; the type and industrial fitness of the population are considerations at least equally, if not more important. It is difficult to prove whether any country is prosperous because of or in spite of high protection. The three countries to-day with the highest tariff levels are the United States, Spain, and Russia. The standard of living varies greatly in these countries. Obviously, a high tariff does not suffice to bring prosperity to a country which is poor in natural resources, like Spain, or torn by revolution, like Russia.

In the years immediately preceding the war there was a tendency toward increasing protection. Great Britain alone of the industrial nations believed that its prosperity was enhanced by free trade.

II. POSTWAR

After the destruction of capital, the loss of man power, the long interruption of normal production, the obvious impoverishment, caused by the World War, it would seem that long-visioned, broad-minded selfishness would have dictated a policy of closer cooperation between the nations. Only by cultivating existing markets and opening up new ones, by stimulating production, by freeing economic life of its trammels, could the loss be speedily made good. But almost without exception the nations took the other course. Old trading units, like the Austrian and Russian Empires, were broken up not only politically but economically. The 5,000 miles of new frontiers became so many more barriers to the free exchange of commodities. Two fallacies—now generally recognized as fallacies—stimulated this movement. First, many believed that they could best achieve prosperity at the expense of others, and that the more they penalized or blocked the trade of their neighbors, the more they would profit. It is pretty generally recognized to-day that no nation can long prosper in the midst of bankruptcy. The lowering of prosperity, which comes from general blockade can not be compensated for by protective tariffs. And, secondly, the wave of political "nationalism" which swept over Europe—especially in the Near East, where new nations had won their long-desired independence—inevitably became economic nationalism as well. Despite the fact that all the trend of our day is toward increasing economic interdependence, the fallacy of "self-contained nationalism" has had a great following. The general staffs became high protectionists, insisting that all the key industries of war supplies should be built up at home.

We can picture the confusion by suggesting that the militia of each of our 48 States insist on having their Army motor cars built in their own State and be able to impose interstate tariffs which would make it possible for agricultural States to build automobiles in competition with established industrial centers.

This "economic nationalism" meant adding the waste of duplication to the impoverishment of war. New plants, built where they could not be economically operated, were kept alive by high tariffs. Old plants, which had grown up naturally near fuel or power and raw material, lost their markets as a result of these tariff walls, and so forced to close down, threw new brigades and army corps into the ranks of the unemployed, which lowered the level of living and the general purchasing power.

Not content with formal and declared tariff war, many nations sought even greater "protection" by embargoes, import and export prohibitions, juggling with terminology in the tariff schedules, complications in customs formalities, which further impeded transfrontier trade. The attack on competitive foreign commerce is often veiled, sometimes taking the form of "sanitary regulations." All sorts of ingenious tricks have been tried to beat the axiom that "You can not sell abroad unless you buy abroad."

The raising of tariff barriers was also stimulated by the fluctuation and depreciation of currency. As currencies fell in some countries tariff walls rose in others as a protection against an influx of cheap goods from the areas of cheap currency. These protective measures were deemed necessary to safeguard home industries, but the closing of markets to the goods of the countries suffering from currency depreciation made it more difficult for them to cure their exchange and currency troubles. Nevertheless currencies have now been stabilized or gotten within control, but the barriers which were raised against unstable currencies still remain and hamper commerce after the reason for their erection has disappeared.

Tariff revisions have been frequent and almost always upward. Inevitably it is cumulative, for it invites retaliation. If A could raise its own tariffs and persuade the rest of the alphabet to lower theirs, A might gain. But this is not human nature. B, C, D, and Z raise theirs in retaliation and the hoped-for gains prove illusions. As it becomes apparent that the profits of this policy of erecting barriers to trade are less than anticipated—that it defeats its own purpose—the losses which all suffer from the slowing down of commerce become even more apparent.

The policy of protection means, in the long run, the sacrifice of the foreign market for the home market. The tendency toward mass production, the outstanding development of our economic era, demands mass consumption, the largest possible market. An equally important fact of our day is the increasing complexity of industry—mass production is not possible without access to all sorts of raw material. Major industries gather their raw material from the four corners of the earth. A country like our own, with its vast continental area—the largest free-trade area in the world—furnishing the greatest part of its basic raw materials, consuming nine-tenths of its production, has been able to pursue a policy which subordinates the foreign market. Nature has been very bountiful to us. Within limits—as yet undetermined—we can live on our own fat, but we are reaching out more and more for raw materials from abroad; our home market is already becoming too small; and we must have additional outlets for our surplus products and wealth.

The typical country of Europe is small—relatively few consumers at home. It is lean—poor in raw material. It lacks the resources and markets essential for economic units of production and distribution. It can not afford the luxury of a policy of economic nationalism.

III. THE GENEVA CONFERENCE

The business men of Europe have been seeing with more and more alarm the disastrous results of "economic nationalism" and its accompanying tendency to ever-increasing artificial interference in trade. Uneasiness was being expressed by chambers of commerce everywhere. And in May, 1927, there gathered at Geneva the World Economic Conference. Much valuable spade work had already been done by the preparatory commission and by the economic section of the League of Nations. The information which was given us, in a series of pamphlets, furnished a remarkably comprehensive picture of present economic conditions. Men from every country, men from every special industry could see how their individual problems fitted into the general picture. Viewing the whole in proper perspective, all could see larger significance in the details, with which they were familiar. This matter of tariffs was discussed not from the viewpoint of any particular manufacturer and his possibly selfish interests but from the international viewpoint—from the viewpoint of the prosperity of all, the viewpoint of the common weal.

Approaching the problem from this angle it was at once obvious that, while the determination of fiscal policy is a matter of domestic jurisdiction, it is a matter of more than domestic concern. The world has become so interdependent in its economic life that measures adopted by one nation affect the prosperity of others. No nation can afford to exercise its rights of sovereignty without consideration of the effects on others. National selfishness invites international retaliation. The units of the world's economy must work together or rot separately.

The Economic Conference made no attempt to determine an ideal tariff level—to settle the old controversy between protection and free trade, between high and low tariff. No attempt was made to tell any nation what it should do.

The conference, however, did reach certain very definite conclusions—unanimously. I do not have to remind you of the composition of the conference. There were industrialists, bankers, economists, agriculturists, and laborers. It was as authoritative a body of experts in the matter as was ever convened to discuss economic questions. They were unanimous in favor of simplification of customs terminology and formalities; they recommended universal adherence to the unconditional most favored nation principle; they condemned all veiled and indirect methods of increasing the barriers of trade; they pointed out emphatically the difficulties of frequent alterations in schedules. And they agreed that further heightening of the barriers would be disastrous, that the time had come to take the other direction and reduce them.

The conference was not composed of official governmental representatives. It did not have "power" to bind anybody. But that it expressed the considered convictions of the business world is, I think, proved by the cordial and unanimous indorsement of its findings by the Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce at Stockholm. Even more encouraging is the news that its resolutions have been formally indorsed by the following governments: Germany, Holland, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and the Scandinavian countries.

IV. ARMAMENTS

It is impossible to study the question of reducing these artificial "restraints to trade," without being reminded of the very similar problem of the reduction of armaments. In one case, as in the other, the matter comes directly under the sovereign rights of the nations. Any country has a right to build up the military establishment it desires. Any nation has the right to erect such barriers against international commerce as it thinks will serve its interests. But in both cases the free and uncoordinated exercise of this right has caused great economic burdens and universal embarrassment. In both cases any step taken by one nation to protect its own interests is immediately rendered inadequate by the retaliatory action of others.

It is, I believe, generally conceded that the only hope for the reduction of the burdens and dangers of excessive armaments is through some form of international agreement. I submit that this is also the only method by which we can find sufficient relief from these excessive barriers to trade. International agreement means negotiation, consideration of the others' situation and needs, and mutual concessions.

If each government is to continue, as has been the custom in the past, to fix its customs policy, its military program, as an isolated, individual act of sovereignty, without thought of the repercussion on other countries, the pyramiding of tariffs, the piling up of armaments, is inevitable. We can hope for relief—in the one problem as in the other—only by the method of give-and-take cooperation, by taking the friendly, considerate, and broad view.

V. AMERICA'S PART

When we come finally to the consideration of America's relation to this problem we must answer two questions. First, Are we sufficiently interested to do anything about it? Secondly, If so, what?

Clearly we have stood in a special position, not so much because of distance—the Lindberghs are constantly reducing that—as because of our structure. International trade has not in the past been as important to us as it is to many European countries, but our export trade, while small in comparison to our domestic trade, is rapidly growing in volume and importance, and with the possible exception of Great Britain is now greater than that of any other nation. At present it is largely based on credit supplied by our investors. Purchasers of our products come to us because we have a practical monopoly of the credit they need. We have thus been able to sell our surpluses and let our foreign customers and debtors worry about the trade barriers, but that can not continue indefinitely.

While I am not a protectionist, I recognize that, with the exception of agriculture, our country has been generally prosperous under a high protective tariff, as it has also been under a tariff for revenue only; and I admit that our consumers have been able to adsorb, without apparent detriment to our economic life, the cost of tariff subsidies. We have, however, now changed from a debtor to a creditor Nation, which must alter the effect of our tariff upon our economic life and that of other nations. The real test of our tariff policy will come from the need of additional markets and the necessity to safeguard and recover our foreign loans and investments.

Whatever our differences of opinion about our own tariff policy, I find little dissent from the proposition that Europe can not regain its prosperity unless action is taken to reduce these trade barriers—as recommended by the Economic Conference at Geneva.

Mr. Henry M. Robinson, speaking for the entire American delegation at the Geneva Economic Conference, answered the first question. "Our own experience," he said, "has taught us to consider 'prosperity' as a whole. No industry lives healthily in a period of general depression and instability. No nation can enjoy its full economic activity unless other nations are prosperous. The American people are profoundly interested in the peace and prosperity of Europe."

There is one other point which I submit for your consideration. We, as the growing creditor of Europe, have an added reason to desire the restoration and increase of its prosperity. If we are to continue to lend money to Europe, if we are to be repaid on existing credits, it is to our interest to do all in our power to help Europe in her effort to free herself from this throttling, smothering tangle of artificial trade barriers.

With our increased efficiency, through labor-saving devices and mass production, we have raised our standards of living and our purchasing powers above that of any other country. Instead of being at a disadvantage in competing with Europe, as was formerly supposed to be the case, because of the low wage and standard of living in Europe, it is becoming increasingly evident that Europe is at a disadvantage in competing with us just because of their low wages and low standards of living which reduce their efficiency, their earnings, their purchasing power, and their consumption.

The second question, "What can we do?" remains to be answered. There is unanimous feeling among our citizens that the results of recent cuts in direct taxation have been beneficial. I suggest that a cut in indirect taxation would have an equally beneficial result in our national economy. It would be even more popular, for whereas direct taxation falls mostly on the more prosperous few, indirect taxation bears on all. But it is especially because of its effect on the international problem that I advocate it at this moment.

The experts gathered at the Geneva Conference and the leading business interests represented in the International Chamber of Commerce have expressed the conviction that the removal of barriers which unduly hamper trade would promote the prosperity of all the world. A 10 per cent reduction of all of our tariff schedules would be a wise and effective way to set an example in a policy of removing such barriers. It would not work a hardship upon any of our efficient industries, and it would bring relief to many of our people. It would also have an enormous effect upon opinion throughout the world and encourage the adoption of policies which would make the world more peaceful and more prosperous.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BRUCE ON THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered at the University of Virginia on August 18, 1927, on the eighteenth amendment, by the Senator from Maryland, Hon. WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator BRUCE. In discussing the eighteenth amendment the first thing that we should dismiss from our minds is the idea that it is such a hallowed thing that to question its expediency justly subjects the person, guilty of such sacrilege, to the reproach of nullification (to borrow a much-abused word from the vocabulary of prohibition). Such an idea, of course, is mere political claptrap, or else but another suggestion of the distempered fanaticism which, as some one has wittily said, seems to regard the Federal Constitution, aside from the eighteenth amendment, as but a preamble to that amendment. There is no peculiar odor of sanctity, so far as I can detect, about the eighteenth amendment; only the strong, rank smell of illicit abuses, bred by a largely unselfish but altogether fatuous effort to make another man of man. To be sure, save under circumstances wholly exceptional, all laws are entitled to obedience so long as they remain on the statute book. Until they are amended or repealed it is the duty of the executive, the judge, the juryman, the prosecuting attorney, and every other official servitor of the law faithfully to do his best to secure their enforcement, and if the citizen violates them he must not expect to escape their penalties. But all laws, nevertheless, whether they assume the form of constitutional or statutory mandates, are but tentative expressions of the popular will. Otherwise, there would be no such thing as an amended or abrogated law. As it is, laws, I hardly need say, are very frequently amended, and not infrequently revoked by Congress and our State legislatures. Like pots, they can sometimes be tinkered in such a way as to be made more serviceable; and sometimes their mischievousness or inutility is so thoroughly established by experience that there is nothing left to do except to consign them, like pots too worthless for tinkering, to the waste heap. The provisions of our Federal Constitution and State constitutions are not so often amended or repealed because they usually prescribe rules of conduct far more fundamental and axiomatic than those prescribed by statutory law; but they, too, at times have to be changed to meet the political, social, and economic changes of a growing human society or to retrieve blunders made in hours of popular error, passion, or hysteria. One thing is certain. Only a very small part of a real, respected law is found in print. Far the greater part of every such law resides in the unwritten code of public opinion. In other words, all truly efficacious measures are enacted by nature and reason rather than by legislative bodies. Like a man, a law to be respected must be respectable. It must be in keeping with the settled sentiments and impulses of human nature, the sober processes of human reasoning, and the ripe instruction of human experience. If it is lacking in these essentials, it is only that most futile and despicable thing, a law without a moral sanction; and its deficiency in that respect can never be made good by any mere legal sanctions, however rigorously punitive. Every effort to enforce such a law simply demonstrates the truth of Edmund Burke's saying that bad laws are the worst sort of tyranny.

To illustrate the soundness of these propositions it is not necessary to resort to statutory law. We need only turn to the instrument of which the eighteenth amendment is a part. In its provisions relating to the Electoral College we have an example of the atrophy that is likely to overtake even a constitutional requirement that does not fully harmonize with the political genius of a people. It was the intent of the framers of the Federal Constitution that the members of the Electoral College should exercise their own discretion in the election of a President, and the inspiration of this intent was the belief that the selection of a President could be more safely committed to a comparatively small body of representative and intelligent men than to the whole mass of the voters. Yet, as we know, presidential electors have become the mere dummies of the two great national parties, and submissively name as President whomsoever may be designated for the office of President by the party to which the majority of the electors belong. In effect, in this instance, the Federal Constitution has simply been nullified by public opinion. In the history of the Federal Constitution is also found an example of the impotence of constitutional provisions which have become deeply repugnant to the moral progress of humanity. Despite the guaranties originally created by the Federal Constitution for the security of the institution of slavery, and but for which it would never have been adopted, the time came when the hostility of legislatures and courts in the free States to slavery made it impossible for the slaveholding States to enforce those guaranties. In the Federal Constitution is also found an example of the paralysis that ultimately creeps over every irrational and unnatural effort under constitutional forms to accomplish an object not approved by the human reason. All that law could do to place the southern slave on a footing of political equality with his master was embodied in the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, but, by one ingenious artifice or another, suggested by the instinct of self-preservation, these provisions of the Federal Constitution have been reduced to what Grover Cleveland once happily termed "innocuous desuetude." Surely I need no better proofs than these three examples, which I have drawn from the history of the Federal Constitution itself, to show that, no matter how solemnly or sternly a provision of the Federal Constitution, whether sumptuary in its nature or not, may be framed, it will, if out of accord with the profounder political intuitions, the moral sentiments, or the reasoned conclusions of those upon whom it operates, sooner or later, unless repealed or modified, as it should be, become dormant or despised.

Just such a law as the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, which sought, in defiance of all sane thinking, to impose ignorant negro suffrage on the southern body politic, is the eighteenth amendment, which declares that the use of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes is a criminal thing per se, at all times and under all circumstances. It falls within the scope of that other saying of Edmund Burke, as profound as it was passionate: "Never, no never, did nature say one thing and wisdom say another!" It is a violation of human nature; it is an affront to the human reason; it is a gross invasion of personal liberty; and, despite all the crime and misery that has resulted from strong drink, it can justly be pronounced a totally arbitrary and unreasonable incubus upon the generous and joyous side of human existence. In fine, it is a law without a moral sanction.

Assuming this to be so, how childish is the thought that the millions of human beings in the United States, who desire the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment, are under any obligation to refrain from expressing their honest opinion of it, or from doing anything in their power lawfully to bring its blighting, demoralizing, and corrupting influence to an end!

As I see it, the prohibition, initiated by the eighteenth amendment, has, as I have frequently affirmed, proved a disastrous, tragic failure. It is hard to imagine anything vainer than prohibition which does not prohibit; and yet this is just the kind of prohibition which has distinguished the practical workings of the Volstead Act. So far from the truth is the claim of the Anti-Saloon League that the Federal Government has been insincere or listless in its efforts to enforce that act that it can be confidently asserted that rarely in human history has any other government ever striven so faithfully and persistently to enforce a law, in the teeth of a vast volume of hostile public opinion. Congress has exhibited a readiness, little short of abject servility, to enact any legislation that the Anti-Saloon League has asked it to enact; notwithstanding the fact that many members of that body, and, among them, some who are most conspicuously subservient to the league, are but poor exemplars in their personal habits of the principle of total abstinence. Indeed, a docile bull, led about by the nose, is no mean illustration of the extent to which Congress has, for many years, resigned itself to the guiding hand of the league. Even the sedate and self-satisfied Senate, which has always been so reluctant to apply its cloture rule to protracted debate, applied it at the last session of Congress to the discussion of the prohibition reorganization bill, in which the league was so deeply interested, almost before one could say "Jack Robinson." So far as I know, not even Wayne B. Wheeler, the late general counsel of the league, quick as he is to sniff out official misconduct, in connection with the Volstead Act, has ever found fault with the spirit of dispassionate construction that the Supreme Court of the United States has brought to bear upon the interpretation of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. Nor, so far as I know, is any Federal judge justly chargeable with official faithlessness in the application of the Volstead Act; though it is fair to assume that some of our Federal judges must have felt at times, when scores of helpless wretches were passing through their courts in transit from the undergraduate school of artificial crime to the postgraduate school of real crime, as if the legislative mind had been caught up in the grasp of some kind of mad medieval superstition. Equally conscientious has been the official conduct of the higher executive officers of the Federal Government in the performance of the obligations that they owed to the Volstead Act.

No more convincing proof of the unenforceability of that act can be cited than the fact that even such an honorable, courageous, and intelligent administrator as Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, the recent Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, was unable to enforce it; and this, despite the fact that, true to his military training, he even sought by the appointment of professional soldiers as his assistants to convert ordinary prohibition raids into something closely akin to military dragonnades. Nor should I fail to mention the frequent reorganizations that prohibition enforcement has undergone in the sincere effort of its directors, like a fevered patient, seeking a cool place by shifting restlessly from one side of his bed to the other, to find some scheme of operations equal to the task of checkmating the bootlegger and his patrons. Neither should I fail to mention the extent to which the Coast Guard has been diverted from its old function of saving human life to the function of running down rum pirates, the costly vessels that have been added to its fleet by new construction or transfers from the Navy, and the vast and ever-mounting sums that have been appropriated annually by Congress for the enforcement of the Volstead Act, and that now, it is safe to say, aggregate not less than $30,000,000 per annum, to say nothing of the sums that are expended in the enforcement of the same law by all the States of the Union, except New York and Maryland, which have wisely washed their hands, as they had a clear constitutional right to do, of the whole dirty business.

So far as I can discern, the only respect in which the Federal Government has been slack in enforcing the Volstead Act has been in declining to comply with the request of the Anti-Saloon League that it use its Army and Navy also as instruments for prohibition enforcement. But as to that, it is, I think, but just to the Government to say that, while to the mind of Wayne B. Wheeler there may be no distinction of any sort to be taken between agencies for combating German kaisers and agencies for combating rum kings, this is not the case so far as the discriminating portion of the American public is concerned.

For my present purposes, it is enough to say that, earnestly as the higher officials of the Federal Government have endeavored to make prohibition a practical reality, they have not succeeded in doing so. Before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, it was a common saying that, no matter how far short our States and cities might fall of enforcing their laws or ordinances, the Federal Government always enforced its laws; but now that it has undertaken to cope with a natural appetite, old as the Blue Ridge, and only less imperious than hunger, it has more than met its match. The recent discovery of a wine jar at Tell-en-Nashe shows that men were drinking 600 years before Christ, and it is safe to say that they will be drinking 600 years after the advent of the Messiah. This country has been engaged in not a few wars. It has had its war with Great Britain, its war with Mexico, its Civil War, and its war with Germany, but the most desperate war in which it has ever been involved is that which it is now waging on human nature. One combatant is a physical want which has been felt and gratified by men since man was a primeval being, with the sun and the stars about him, and the other is a government which, powerful as it is, is not powerful enough to enforce a law intrinsically devoid of moral authority. When the Volstead Act took effect in January, 1920, there was for a time a marked decline in the consumption of liquor in the United States. This fact was due partly to the dejection to which the opponents of prohibition were temporarily reduced by defeat, and partly to the disposition of conscientious citizenship to give a new law a fair trial; but it was mainly due to the fact that an entire liquor underworld could not be organized overnight. But one was organized, and with an amazing degree of rapidity.

By 1921 the river of strong drink was flowing underground with almost as full a flood as it had ever flowed above ground. Whisky and other liquors were smuggled in vast quantities into the United States from abroad by way of Canada, Mexico, Cuba, and the Bahamas and in smaller quantities from the Bermudas and not a few of the West Indian islands, besides Cuba and the Bahamas. Even such small and barren rocks as the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon on the southwest coast of Newfoundland became important forwarding points for a bustling contraband trade; and from a paper, contributed to the Saturday Evening Post of October 2, 1926, by Maj. Walton A. Green, chief prohibition investigator, we learn that the Bahamas, a group of scattered coral reefs, with a population of only 53,000 persons, mainly negroes, were collecting annually at that time from its bootlegging exporters a customs revenue of around $3,500,000. Illicit stills shot up like mushrooms, after a mellow shower, in swamps, in mountain fastnesses, in dense thickets, on river craft, in attics, in basements, in garages, in warehouses, in office buildings, even in caves and other underground retreats. Besides, thousands of householders, who had never made a drop of spirits, wine, or beer in their lives, availing themselves of the fact that the arts of distillation and fermentation are among the simplest of all arts, turned to the practice of manufacturing home brew in their own homes from peaches, from cherries, from blackberries, from elderberries, from the dandelion, and, above all, from corn sugar, the grape, and the materials that enter into beer. Indeed, home brewing soon became such an important branch of domestic industry that one began to ask himself whether the resuscitation of the handloom and the spinning wheel was not also at hand. From that time until the present hour the Federal Government has been in active and untiring pursuit of the protean rum devil. So far there is very little to justify the belief that it will ever catch up with him. Repelled from the front door of the American Continent, he slips around to its back door. Driven from the sea, he meets the deficiency in his wares, caused by that fact, by setting up more stills, diverting more industrial alcohol, and practicing more of other sorts of frauds on the Volstead Act. If he were cut off from these resources, it is easy to imagine him donning the white apron of a good housewife and giving a still greater stimulus to the expansion of vineyard acreage and the sale of corn sugar and wine grapes. It is true that with the aid of its immense flotilla of some 385 rum-chasing vessels of all sorts the Coast Guard has succeeded in making the smuggling of liquor into this country by sea more difficult. Whole fleets of rum runners no longer hover close to our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, but the recent capture from time to time off those seaboards of enormously valuable cargoes of liquor is evidence enough that the cargoes of some rum runners would not be caught in the Coast Guard net if many more did not slip through. Be this as it may, so far as the level of drink has been lowered by the interception of liquor on its way by sea to our Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, it has been promptly restored, as General Andrews himself has recognized, by a quickened inflow from Canada and a quickened outflow from our own many illicit sources of domestic supply. And what if the Government were successful in suppressing all smuggled and moonshine liquor as well as all other liquor derived from commercial sources? Unless it were to abandon completely its crackbrained idea that all drink, whether made by the commercial distiller, fermenter, or brewer for sale, or by the Government itself, or by some good, virtuous matron in her own home for domestic use, is an iniquitous and shameful thing, its troubles would just begin, for anyone who has wit enough to buy the proper container and to express and ferment a little fruit juice can manufacture an agreeable beverage with a satisfactory alcoholic content.

In the event that I have suggested all who desired drink would simply make it in their own homes, and then if the Government ventured to enter these homes more freely than it has yet dared to do, perhaps, it is not unlikely that so much disorder and bloodshed would follow that even Congress might recall the noble utterance of the renowned orator and statesman, Lord Chatham, whose name is so intimately associated with the history of American liberty, "The poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the force of the Crown. It may be frail; its roof may shake; the wind may blow through it; the storms may enter; the rain may enter; but the King of England can not enter." The full import of these stirring words came home to me a few months ago, when I read a newspaper account of an incident that had just taken place in the State of Ohio. A prohibition agent broke into a private house, and when asked by its occupant why he did so, replied, "It is none of your damned business," whereupon the occupant, who was afterwards acquitted by a jury, shot him dead. From such an incident as this, which was marked by only one of many prohibition outrages, it is fair to infer that if the Federal Government were to lay aside its present scruples and freely to enter private homes for the purpose of arresting and punishing their inmates for manufacturing a little drink for domestic use, it might staunch the flow of some kinds of liquor, but would certainly set not a little red liquor of another kind to flowing. In a recent report Donald D. Conn, the managing director of the California Vineyardists Association, states that during the past five years they had witnessed a development in grape acreage and production unprecedented in the history of any perishable commodity. When the Volstead Act went into effect one of the vine growers of California, believing that his business was doomed, took his own life. How the heart of the poor fellow would have been cheered if he could only have foreseen that the grape production of California would rise from 671,626 tons in 1918 to 1,019,000 tons in 1926!

In maintaining the proposition that prohibition does not prohibit I will not try to delve too deeply into statistics, for in that Serbonian bog armies whole of prohibitionists and antiprohibitionists have sunk. It is sufficient for me on this occasion to note the steady increase in convictions for violations of the Volstead Act, seizure of illicit distilleries, stills, still worms, and fermenters, and commitments for violations of the Volstead Act to Federal penitentiaries and State institutions for the care of Federal prisoners, and in arrests for drunkenness, which have taken place since the effective date of the Volstead Act, January 17, 1920. In 1921 the first full year of national prohibition, 17,962 persons were convicted in the Federal courts of violations of the Volstead Act, and in 1926 no less than 44,022. In 1921 there were 95,933 seizures by Federal agents of illicit distilleries, stills, still worms, and fermenters, and in 1926 not less than 161,979. In 1922 there were 97 commitments for violations of the Volstead Act to Federal penitentiaries and State institutions for the care of Federal prisoners, and in 1926 not less than 1,837. By personal application, before April 5 of last year, to the chiefs of police of 36 of the leading cities of the Union, including Chicago, where drink cases are merged in disorderly conduct cases, I ascertained that the aggregate number of arrests in these cities in 1921 for drunkenness was 209,664, and in 1925 not less than 407,032. Later the Moderation League, a civic association of the highest standing, published tables of arrests for drunkenness made after the effective date of the Volstead Act, down to January 1, 1926, by the police departments of 564 cities and towns of the United States.

The president of the league was Austen G. Fox, the well-known New York lawyer, and its research director was Stanley Shirk. Among its directors were Newcomb Carlton, the president of the Western Union Telegraph Co.; William N. Dykman, president of the New York State Bar Association; the Right Rev. Charles Fiske, bishop of central New York; Haley Fiske, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; Alexander C. Humphreys, president of Stevens University; Charles A. Peabody, president of the Mutual Life Insurance Co.; William Barclay Parsons, president of the board of trustees of Columbia University; William C. Redfield, the former Secretary of Commerce; Henry S.

Pritchett, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, and former president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Elihu Root, the celebrated lawyer and statesman; and Dr. William H. Welch, the celebrated Johns Hopkins pathologist. According to the tables of the league, drunkenness increased almost twice as fast in the United States in 1925 as in 1924. More specifically, in the 564 cities and towns tabulated by the league arrests for drunkenness in 1924 were 21,000 in excess of the arrests for that offense in 1923, and in 1925, 36,241 in excess of the arrests for that offense in 1924. In 384 of the 564 cities and towns, such arrests in 1925 were even more numerous than in 1914, when some of the States still licensed saloons and others were under State prohibition or local option. Especially significant is the fact, brought out by the league, that conditions in the former so-called "dry" States were worse, as compared with 1914, than conditions in the so-called "wet" States. One of the most noteworthy facts established by the study of the league and my own study is the fact that Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews was quite correct when, as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, he declared a year or so ago that the bootleg industry is coextensive with our entire country. It, at any rate, is one thing in American life which has no tinge of sectionalism about it. There has been much discussion as to what should be our national flower. Let me suggest the dandelion. Even when one speaks of the "dry West" he should be understood as limiting that adjective to its alkali deserts, and even the "dry South" belongs to the province of dry humor rather than to that of statistical verity. In an editorial last year the New York Times called attention to the fact that Federal prohibition agents had found in 1925 thirty-five times as many stills in Montana in proportion to population as they had in New York; and about the same time it also called attention to the fact that in proportion to population arrests for drunkenness in Pocatello, Idaho, had been ten times as numerous as in the city of New York; and in Twin Falls, Idaho, nearly five times as numerous. It is quite startling that a little provincial home of purity and peace like Pocatello should have a thirst ten times as urgent as that of a great cosmopolitan Babylon like New York. Of course, the State of New York obtains its supply of liquor largely from big smugglers, and Montana doubtless obtains its supply largely from small-scale moonshiners. My intent is merely to make the point that no matter how the several States of the Union get their liquor, somehow or other they all get it in one way or another. The West is undeniably a sinner as well as the East; nor is the South by any means a saint, to put it very, very mildly. Of the illicit plants and agencies seized by the Federal Prohibition Unit in 1925, 70 per cent were seized in the theoretically dry States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. More distilleries and fermenters were seized in Georgia during the fiscal year 1925 than in any other State of the Union.

Last year I received newspaper clippings from quite a number of citizens of Atlanta, Ga., showing that more persons had been brought into the police stations of that city for being drunk on the Easter Sunday of that year than had ever been brought into them on any previous day in its history. In a letter last year to the Hon. W. D. Upshaw, the Member of Congress from Georgia, M. B. Wellborn, of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, said: "I may say that, from what I can learn, drinking is almost universal not only in Atlanta but in every town in Georgia, and throughout the South"; and Georgia is by no means the only southern offender. It is simply keeping up its reputation as the Empire State of the South in drink, as well as in everything else. Last May Judge W. W. McCrory, of the district court of San Antonio, Tex., was reported as saying: "If everybody in Texas who violates the prohibition law were really convicted, just about everybody in the State, except the preachers, would be in our penitentiaries." Last year Ben. C. Sharpe, the Federal prohibition administrator for the Carolinas and Georgia, issued a statement declaring that there was more liquor in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia than there had been in the past three years. Some time ago T. L. Caudle, the special prosecutor appointed by Governor McLean of North Carolina to assist in the prosecution of a traverser, reminded the jury, in the course of his address to them, that they should not disregard the testimony of witnesses for the State who had been in the chain gang, because they had been convicted only of violations of the prohibition law; and, turning toward the audience sitting in the court room, exclaimed, "If I were to ask every man out there who has violated the prohibition law to rise, there wouldn't be a bench warmer left, with the possible exception of a few ministers and tea topers." A short time ago, too, in a letter to the New York Herald-Tribune, R. Charlton Wright, the editor of the Columbia (S. C.) Record, wrote: "If there is as a product of sincere conviction and honest observance of the law such a reality as the 'dry South,' I have yet to see it, and I have lived and journeyed all over it for more than 40 years." When I was compiling arrests for drunkenness in 36 cities of the Union my attention was called to the fact that Richmond and New Orleans were among the cities in which the number of arrests for drunkenness in 1924 was in excess of the number for the last year of the pre-prohibition era.

I shall not deal with the North and East in such detail as I have done with the West and South, because they do not affect, so far as I am aware, to be lands of Arcadian simplicity and innocence as respects strong drink. Indeed, they seem rather to glory in their turpitude. Like our first parents they are naked and not ashamed. According to a study made by William P. Eno, of Washington City, in 1923, arrests per 100,000 of population in dry Boston were eight times what they were in wet Montreal. In July, 1926, the number of speak-easies in New York City was estimated by Chester B. Mills, the Federal prohibition administrator, at 15,000, a total of more than 100 per cent in excess of the total number of licensed saloons existing in the five boroughs of Manhattan in 1918 and more than 14 per cent in excess of the entire number of licensed saloons existing in the whole State of New York in 1918. In July, 1926, a United Press dispatch from Detroit reported that the police estimate of the number of "blind pigs" in Detroit at that time was 15,000 as against the 1,600 licensed saloons which existed in that city before prohibition. Need I speak of Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Baltimore, or Chicago? No! I will pass them by, merely saying, in the words of Lear, "Pah! Pah! Give me an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination." Perhaps, however, I might dwell for a moment upon Washington, for the National Capital might naturally be expected to set a good moral example in every respect to other portions of the United States. It is there that Congress holds its sessions; that the Supreme Court sits; that the President resides; that the Federal Government is clothed with exclusive jurisdiction by the Federal Constitution; and that the Prohibition Unit has its headquarters. Suffice it to say that arrests for drunkenness in Washington have mounted from 6,375 for the year 1921 to 13,588 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927.

Whether there has been any increase in drinking in rural communities since the enactment of the Volstead Act it is, of course, difficult to say. For obvious reasons they can not be kept under the same searching surveillance by the Prohibition Unit as cities or towns. As a rule, they have no police with which to arrest drunkards, and do not trouble themselves about drink statistics; and, moreover, they have always looked for refreshment largely to the hard cider and the home-made wine which the Anti-Saloon League, recognizing the political power of the farmer, was so astute as to exempt from the provisions of the Volstead Act, which prescribe an alcoholic limitation of less than one-half of 1 per cent.

From what I have said it is manifest that, whatever else national prohibition has done, it has not prohibited. Indeed, this seems to be either tacitly or expressly admitted by some of the higher prohibition officials of the Government itself. Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, the sanest individual to whom the administration of the Volstead Act has ever been committed, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, has just retired in disgust; and Maj. Walton A. Green, formerly the prohibition investigator under him, commenting upon his retirement a few days ago, said, "The new man [General Andrews] slowed up the process of disintegration. That is all he did. That is all anyone could have done. No man could have maintained the morale of an underpaid and execrated organization in the face of the brilliant and insidious campaign of the wets." The same situation has also been summed up with no little epigrammatic point by Emory Buckner, the former United States district attorney for the southern district of the State of New York: "The drys think they have won because they have the law. The wets think they have won because they have the liquor." Even Dr. Clarence True Wilson, the secretary of the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, was credited some months ago with the mournful observation: "Prohibition enforcement leaks like a sieve." All together, at the present time, it looks as if Mrs. Partington might yet lay aside her broom and give up her Herculean task of sweeping back the Atlantic Ocean. She is, perhaps, beginning to think that General Andrews employed a very apt phrase before his retirement when he spoke of the "endless growth" of stills.

As I see it, national prohibition has not subserved one single useful purpose unless it be that of accumulating a fund of experience which will be of monitory value when the American people shall retrace their steps, as they will assuredly do, and go back to the crossroads where, in an evil hour, they deserted the open highway that was conducting them safely to temperance for the mire and miasma of the prohibition bog. It is said that prohibition has made its influence felt in the form of increased savings deposits and the like, but this idea, of course, assumes that there has been prohibition—and there has not been, as I have shown. It is too plain for discussion that we have enjoyed an extraordinary degree of business prosperity since the World War because in many remarkable ways we have, above all the other industrial nations of the world, been the industrial beneficiary of that war. To no small extent Canada has, likewise, been a beneficiary of the World War, and though, with the exception of a few provinces, wet, has yet shared the economic welfare of the United States to such a degree that the Canadian currency at times has been at a premium over ours.

It is also said that the industrial worker is a steadier worker now than he was before prohibition. If so, it is only because he is drinking home-brewed wine and beer now in his own home in place of the hard liquor which he formerly obtained at the old saloon; which is just what every intelligent system of liquor regulation might well seek to encourage. Besides, even if prohibition had never gone into force, there is no reason why the industrial worker should not be drinking less to-day than he did when it went into force. Everyone whose memory goes back to the first legislative steps taken in the field of national prohibition knows that both employers and workers were more progressively alive then to the need for sobriety in industry than they had ever been in the past; and this is true of both the worker and his union. One thing is certain, and that is that nothing can be shallower than the idea that repugnance to prohibition is limited to the smart set. It has no more obdurate enemy in the United States to-day than the American Federation of Labor, which, very justly, sees no reason why the employer should have his glass of wine and the worker not have his glass of beer. In view of the odious system of tyranny that national prohibition has set up, in some respects, he might even reasonably doubt, with the Archbishop of York, whether, after all, it is not better to be free than to be sober. And I am glad to see that such renowned captains of industry as Charles M. Schwab and Elbert H. Gary have recently been reported as being sufficiently in accord with the American Federation of Labor to think that there should be a nation-wide referendum to determine whether the American people wish prohibition to be continued.

The morbid sequels of prohibition have been so numerous that it is hard to state them all for very weariness. To begin with, the eighteenth amendment, by engrafting upon the Federal Constitution a mere sumptuary law, has set a dangerous precedent for the further effacement of the old lines of partition between organic and statutory law, and between National and State authority. The prohibition which it creates is peculiarly one that the States should have been left free to adopt or reject, as they listed, in accordance with their respective social traditions, customs, usages, and urban and rural conditions. In the next place, the fanatical nature of the real driving force behind prohibition has given a rude shock to the spirit of some of the most sacred rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution; such as the right of the citizen to be secure in his person, house, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures; or to be exempt from being twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense, or to have a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury. I have in mind, of course, among other things, the instances in which prohibition agents have entered homes without a warrant; or have stopped and searched motor cars without reasonable cause; or have brought about prosecutions for violations of the Volstead Act in both the Federal and State courts; or have obtained padlock injunctions from juryless courts of equity. National prohibition has diverted into the pockets of foreign and domestic bootleggers the enormous tax revenue of $442,839,544.98, which the Federal Government was receiving from distilled spirits and fermented liquors in 1918, and which could very seasonably at this time be applied to the payment of our national debt and the reduction of Federal taxation, or to flood control and flood relief in the Mississippi Valley.

It has also diverted from the channels of trade and commerce in the United States millions of dollars which are now spent for drink by American tourists in Canada, Mexico, Cuba, the Bahamas, the Bermudas, and Europe. It is said that as many as 200,000 tourists from this country visit Montreal and Quebec each season, and that a large, if not the greater part, of them are attracted to those cities by the opportunities that they afford to the American visitor to gratify a perfectly legitimate instinct without any danger of being pestered by snoopers or spies. It is computed by Gilson Gardner, the well-known newspaper writer, who has made a special study of Canadian liquor conditions, that out of the total annual gross receipts of the Quebec Liquor Commission 40 per cent, or the sum of $16,000,000, is derived from American patrons of Canadian liquor stocks. When I was in the crowded dining room of the Mayfair Hotel in London a few months ago, I observed that there was hardly an American diner in the room—and with scarcely an exception all the diners were Americans—who was not enjoying a bottle of wine with his dinner. Truly, indeed, does the old Latin writer say that men who cross the seas change their sky but not their natures, and yet like some magic spell of enchantment in a fairly tale the spell of genial fellowship that has been worked by wine in social intercourse since the earliest dawn of human history was by the Volstead Act expected to be reversed as soon as those diners turned their backs on London and their faces toward the United States. In England, where there is no such thing as prohibition, drunkenness is steadily declining, and during the whole time that I was in France, before I went to London (a period of some weeks), I never saw a man in the slightest degree under the influence of drink, though I observed, as every traveler does, that every carpenter or mason in Paris, as well as his employer, takes his glass of wine with his midday meal. After observing the habits of some of the European peoples, I find myself asking whether if such a thing as prohibition were submissively accepted by a people, that very fact would not betoken a low rather than a high state of civilization; in other words, a human society which was constrained by its own lack of moral and social culture to rely for sobriety upon legal compulsion rather than upon the promptings of social decency nurtured by the church, the home, and the general canons of good conduct.

National prohibition has worked no improvement in the health of the American people. The most that the inexorable statistics of drunkenness permit the prohibitionists to claim is that the volume of liquor drunk now is less than the volume drunk before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. A very humble claim indeed is that, if it can be sustained at all, when the fact is borne in mind that the vast machinery of the Federal Government has been kept in motion ever since the adoption of that amendment for the purpose of suppressing drink altogether. If the prohibitionist is right in his claim then it must be due to the terribly toxic character of the stuff with which prohibition has poisoned the bowels of the American people, such as wood alcohol, the fusel oil in new-made whisky, and the denatured alcohol that the Federal Cæsar Borgia denatures with lethal and nauseous ingredients that the health of the American people is as deeply prejudiced by alcoholism to-day, to say the least, as it was before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. In 1926, the death rate among the 17,000,000 industrial policyholders of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. was the highest in the history of that company since 1917, and was 24 per cent in excess of the death rate among the same policyholders from the same cause during the year 1925.

I take these statements from a statistical bulletin issued by the company during the present year. In a report, rendered in 1925, by the State Hospital Commission of the State of New York, it was alleged that alcoholic insanity had trebled in that State during the five years of national prohibition. In a statement issued during the present year Dr. George H. Bigelow, commissioner for public health in the State of Massachusetts, finds that in the States included in the registration area of the United States Census Bureau deaths from alcoholism have increased more than 500 per cent since the first year of the Volstead Act. The effect of prohibition, taken in connection with the precautions that the Government adopts to prevent the diversion of industrial alcohol from industrial purposes, is to place the Government in the position of frequently visiting a mere human weakness with capital punishment. National prohibition has greatly stimulated the use of narcotic drugs. When a besieged town is deprived of wholesome meat it takes to eating rats. The total number of convictions under the Federal antinarcotic act rose from 2,865 in 1922 to 3,465 in 1926.

The national prohibition act has fostered not only a profound contempt for itself but more or less disrespect for law generally. It is safe to say that, perhaps, one-half of the people of the United States would feel no moral obligation to report a violation of the Volstead Act that had been brought to their notice; and such an attitude toward one law, however specially obnoxious, unquestionably tends to create the same attitude toward other laws. The worst thing about the pathology of prohibition is the fact that it has brought thousands of the most reputable men and women in our American communities into close working relations with some of the most disreputable of their inhabitants. These good people do not balk any more at the thought of using drink purchased from the bootlegger than at the thought of consuming supplies bought from the baker or the grocer. Indeed, many of them speak of "my" bootlegger as familiarly as they might speak of "my" baker or "my" grocer. In the great city of Baltimore, in which my life is passed, I can truly say that I do not know a human being who offered a cocktail or mint julep to a guest before dinner or wine during it, before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, who does not do so now. It may be that all this supply is derived from preprohibition stocks, but, if so, it must have some of the miraculous quality of the widow's cruse. It is true that there is a procession of prisoners, who might have been honorable or useful citizens but for the temptations created by an unnatural and unworkable law, forever filing through our Federal court in Maryland. The number of persons convicted of violations of the Volstead Act in Maryland has risen from 291 in 1921 to 1,013 in 1926. But it is the bootlegger and not his patron who is found in this procession. He not only suffers on his own account but suffers vicariously for the sins of his customer also. It is bad enough to see ordinary citizens living in habitual violation of any law, especially when the lawlessness assumes the form of entertainments given in private homes and clubs to distinguished visitors from abroad, but how much worse is it to see individuals occupying high stations in the public life of the country also violating such a law? This, of course, is a matter about which social decency does not permit one to speak very freely, but to go no further, who that has been a Member of Congress is not familiar with the Congressman with the dry tongue and the wet throat?

Especially distressing is the change which has taken place, since the passage of the Volstead Act, in the relations of women and youthful persons of both sexes to drink. A few years ago a woman was rarely seen drinking a cocktail or a mint julip at a respectable social entertainment, even in one of our great cities. Can that be said to-day? The champions of prohibition "are obliged to admit that drinking among women is rapidly increasing," Bishop Thomas Nicholson, of Chicago, the president of the Anti-Saloon League, was reported in the press to have declared at the thirtieth annual convention of the league, at Washington, in January, 1924. As is true of men, there are some things, perhaps, that women would not do if they were not tyrannically forbidden to do them. To the love of adventure and excitement, which, when legitimately gratified, is one of the most winning traits of youth, prohibition has proved a seductive lure of the most demoralizing character. After traversing a large part of the United States, Ernest W. Mandeville, a writer in the Outlook, says: "Women and young boys and girls of social classes, that never took a drink before prohibition, are now indulging in liquors which are a menace both to their morals and their health." This statement has been strikingly corroborated by the testimony of Police Commissioner Richard E. Enright, of New York, and the Washington City police department. "Inability of the prohibition law to enforce prohibition is causing an increase in the number of young boys and girls who became intoxicated," said Judge H. C. Spicer, of the juvenile court, at Akron, Ohio, quite recently, when two boys, aged 15 and 16, were arraigned before him. "During the past two years," he further declared, "there have been more intoxicated children brought into court than ever before." In June, 1926, Sir Philip Gibbs, the celebrated newspaper correspondent, on his return from a visit to this country, said, after referring to women and young girls whom he had seen intoxicated, "in one of the best houses of a great city in the West: 'College boys carry flasks in their hip pockets and give drinking parties to girl friends.'" One of the worst tendencies of prohibition, as we know, has been to promote the use of hard liquor, at the expense of wine and beer, and to give to the lawless hip flask the place that was once occupied by the reputable decanter. Prohibition has also had the morbid effect of rehabilitating the reputation, without rehabilitating the character, of the poor drunkard. Formerly he was a sort of "drunken helot," and was frequently pointed out as an illustration of the discredit that sooner or later overtakes the habitual drinker. His relations and friends, in their efforts to control his appetite, plead with him, remonstrated with him, warned him, even threatened him; but how difficult to-day is it for many of the temperate relations and friends of a drunkard to enter, with a grave face, upon the task of adjuring or admonishing him to refrain from a mere breach of social decency, when they themselves are violating Constitution and statute!

That prohibition is among the causes which are responsible for the frightful prevalence of murderous violence in the United States at this time there can be no doubt. Scratch a gunman in one of our largest cities and 10 to 1 you will find a bootlegger. Morgan A. Collins, the chief of police of Chicago, in speaking of such wars as rival bootleg groups in northern and southern Illinois were waging against each other, with gas bombs and masks, machine guns and airplanes, affirmed that the situation was "an almost hopeless one," and placed the blame for it all on the lack of popular sympathy which made prohibition a toothless thing.

And how could prohibition be otherwise than the fecund mother of crime? When one law is notoriously too obnoxious to the human reason to command general obedience, the lawlessness that it produces is certain to diminish respect for other laws in breasts none too friendly to any law. In the heart of every community there is an element of which, to use Shakespeare's phrase, neither the world nor the world's law is a friend; and can any sensible man doubt that in time the inevitable sequel of branding and jailing thousands of human beings as criminals on the theory that it is a flagitious crime to sell or possess even a drop of intoxicating liquor, will be the creation of a large body of truly base criminals, ripe for any crime, however heinous? Law in the United States has shown itself but a poor hand at checking crime, but with the aid of the Volstead Act it is in a fair way to demonstrate that as an agency for artificially hatching out criminals it is an efficient thing indeed.

National prohibition, I hardly need say, has also proved a fruitful mother of official corruption. In the beginnings of the Volstead Act the Anti-Saloon League opposed every attempt to bring the field positions of the Prohibition Unit within the scope of the national merit system of appointment. It wished to retain them as spoils, with which to influence the votes of Congressmen, or to gratify the recommendations to appointment of the church element which supplied it with funds. As that accomplished and upright citizen, William Dudley Foulke, who was at one time a member of the United States Civil Service Commission, said, the league "thereby made all these places the spoils of Congressmen, many of whom unscrupulously secured the appointment of scoundrels, who accepted bribes, dishonored the service, and made the enforcement bureau what President Harding himself called it: "A national scandal." So rapidly did this scandal grow and spread, so loaded down with popular opprobrium did the field service of the Prohibition Unit become, that at the last session of Congress an act was passed, at the eager request of the league, bringing all field places in the Prohibition Unit within the scope of the national merit system of appointment. It remains to be seen whether anything will result but the defilement of that fine system, too. During the recent hearings before a Senate subcommittee I brought out the fact that between the first organization of the prohibtion service and February 1, 1926, 875 persons had been separated from the Prohibition Unit, mostly for official faithlessness or downwright rascality, in one form or another, exclusive of delinquents not dismissed but allowed to resign. Since that admirable organization the Coast Guard has been brought within reach of the contaminating touch of the Volstead Act wave after wave of sensational scandal has passed over it; though, to its honor and the honor of its gallant commander, Rear Admiral F. C. Billard, be it said no commissioned officer in its ranks has been convicted of any form of misconduct in connection with prohibition work. Some cases have been reported by Associated Press dispatches in which it has been charged that the landing of illicit liquor on our shores has been actually effected by the crews of Coast Guard boats.

There are not a few brave and honorable men in the field force of the Prohibition Unit, but drunken prohibition agents, reckless prohibition agents, red-handed prohibition agents, perfidious prohibition agents, corrupt prohibition agents, who, that reads the newspapers, from day to day, is not familiar with them all? What community is there in the United States that has not had their misdeeds brought home to it by ruthless invasions of the home, by blood rashly shed, by captured liquor, diverted to their own use, by squalid venality, by detestable perfidy and trickery? Some time ago a prohibition agent in Maryland obtained proof of a violation of the Volstead Act by the mother of a girl by pretending to make honorable overtures of marriage to the daughter. Most of you doubtless recall the speakeasies that have been set up by prohibition officers themselves, in violation of the Volstead Act, as traps for faithless prohibition agents and policemen. And, despite their higher rank, many of the prohibition administrators have been no better than the unworthier prohibition agents. In May, 1926, attention was called in the press to the fact that all four of the Federal prohibition directors, who had been appointed for the State of Wisconsin, had successively become implicated in charges of criminal collusion with liquor outlaws. In November, 1926, General Andrews stated that of the 24 men that he had appointed as prohibition administrators only 9 remained in the office to which they had been appointed, and that in the course of his wholesale turnover he had found it necessary to get rid of a number of subordinates who were either going wrong or refusing to carry out the established policies (to use his own words). State officials, too, as well as Federal officials have been infected by the black plague. Among the 79 persons, including gangsters, saloonkeepers, and bootleggers, indicted at Chicago in October, 1926, for conspiracy to violate the Volstead Act were the mayor and chief of police of Cicero, one of the suburbs of Chicago. Several years ago it took two Pullman cars to convey to the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary the disloyal policemen and prohibition agents caught up on a single raid in Ohio. In September, 1926, in a raid by more than 100 prohibition officers in the "hell-hole" section of Berkeley County, S. C., part of the bag was a Federal prohibition agent, a State constable, and a county sheriff. In other words, the offended majesty of almost every branch of our American political organization was vindicated at a single sweep. Nevertheless, I am afraid that prohibition will make more "hell holes" than it will ever plug up. If I had time, I could recall dozens of illustrations of the rottenness that resides in the very core of the whole police authority upon which the Volstead Act relies for enforcement. But I might well content myself with condemning that authority out of its own mouth. In July, 1926, Edgar R. Ray, prohibition commissioner for western Pennsylvania, in resigning his office said: "This position is best suited for a rich man or a crook. I am neither." Only last month Col. Ira L. Reeves, shortly after resigning as prohibition administrator for the State of New Jersey, said in a newspaper article that men engaged in prohibition enforcement work "depart from the service in two classes—either enriched in pocket or impoverished in character and reputation. I doubt," he added, "if ever before in American history were Federal officials held in such contempt by the general public." As far back as 1925, General Andrews, himself, declared that the bribery of Government officials was the chief obstacle in the way of the enforcement of the Volstead Act.

Only a few days ago, Seymour Lowman, General Andrews's successor, could find nothing more hopeful to say than this: "The great problem is to find for enforcement work, in the Prohibition Bureau, skilled men who will withstand the temptations that beset enforcement officers." In the spring of 1925, Marna S. Poulson, the superintendent of the New Jersey Anti-Saloon League, was reported, in the New York Times, as saying, in an address, at a prohibition rally at Atlantic City: "I don't know of anyone who can make a dollar go further than policemen and dry agents. By frugality, after a year in the service, they acquire automobiles and diamonds." The only hope for the Government, so far as I can see, is to appoint the Angel Gabriel, as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and to supply him with a field, or rather air, force, of archangels and angels, selected in accordance with some system of competitive examination even more searching than our Federal one.

The narrow-minded, acrid spirit, fostered by prohibition, is largely responsible for the excesses of the Ku-Klux Klan. It and the klan are twin cherries. Whenever you find a community in which sectarian bigotry is rife in its most rabid and repulsive forms, and masked and hooded miscreants do not hesitate to flog even old men, boys, and women, there you will find the prohibitionists keyed up to the highest pitch of fanaticism.

I read a day or so ago in the Baltimore Evening Sun that the klan outrages in Alabama, which have recently stirred so deeply the indignation of the enlightened newspapers and citizens of that State, went on from week to week, for four weeks, before two of the leading prohibition organs of Alabama would even comment on them.

After all, however, the gravest responsibility to which prohibition is amenable is that of having called such an organization as the Anti-Saloon League into life. As I have recently said, this league is partly political and partly clerical; that is to say, political enough to discredit the church by bringing it into intimate contact with the mercenary and squalid side of political activity, and clerical enough to be a deadly menace to the independence of the State. If the Catholic Church had set up in this country the kind of Vatican that the league has set up at Washington, and had collected the kind of Peter's pence in this country that the league has collected, a mighty shout of protest would have ascended from one end of the American continent to the other.

No word will ever escape my lips derogatory to the church or to religion, or to any minister of the gospel, who, in the performance of his duties, as a citizen, is true to the reserve of his sacred calling. For years I have been a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. I was born and bred in a Christian home, in Southside, Va., and, next to the influence of that home, nothing has ever been of such service to me, in my efforts to preserve my character from reproach, as the influence exerted over me in my early life by the teachings and the example of some of the Presbyterian divines in that region, who were in learning, in personal dignity, and in purity of life quite the equals, if not the superiors, of any group of individuals that I have ever known. Though, during my boyhood, the region, in which those godly men lived and discharged their duties, felt in full force all the political passions and anxieties of that evil time, never once did I hear one of them utter a word in the pulpit that had the slightest tinge of politics about it. They knew that if ministers of the Gospel could only implant in the hearts of their hearers the general principles of conduct inculcated by Jesus Christ, they could safely leave to the State the high function of harmonizing all its actions with the righteousness that exalteth a nation.

But when I speak of the Anti-Saloon League as I do I feel that I am rendering a service to the church as well as to the State. As I see it, the ministers, who constitute a large part of its executive committee and are the real propelling force behind it, wholly misconceive the scope of their professional office and grossly violate the spirit of the Federal Constitution when they collect enormous amounts of money and use them in befriending or defeating candidates for legislative or other offices, in feeing Members of Congress and other public officials enlisted in its propaganda, and in bulldozing members of all kinds of legislative bodies who are too weak to face and defy their efforts to strip them of the independence and free discretion with which it was the intent of our Federal and State Constitutions to clothe them.

All the inner workings of the Anti-Saloon League have not yet been completely exposed by the Reed Senate committee, for when it was sitting Wayne B. Wheeler was successful in preventing the names of some of the pecuniary contributors to the activities of the league from being divulged. But the records of the league have, for the first time, been laid sufficiently bare to enable us fully to understand just how the adoption of the eighteenth amendment was brought about. It is enough to say that, while that event is largely attributable to just resentment against the abuses of the old saloon, and is partially attributable also to the overstrained feelings kindled by the World War, it is to a very great extent ascribable to the lavish use of money by the league. The Reed committee elicited the fact that during the period from 1920 to 1925 the league expended no less than $13,655,313.72, and from its official records, which came into the possession of the committee, it would appear that the amounts previously collected and disbursed by the league, from 1883 to 1918, aggregated $50,000,000, making a grand total, exclusive of amounts expended by the league in the years 1919 and 1926, of no less than $63,655,313.72. There is reason to believe that the whole slush fund expended by the National Anti-Saloon League and its subsidiaries during the period between 1917 and 1926 approximated quite closely the combined amounts expended by the Republican and Democratic Parties in the two presidential contests which took place during that interval.

Can any intelligent man doubt that the expenditure of such enormous sums as these by such an association as the Anti-Saloon League can be otherwise than an appalling menace to the freedom of elections and to the principles of representative government contained in our Federal and State constitutions? Can anyone who knows what a greedy thing power is doubt that, if the sway of that league is not shattered, it will ultimately seek, in still other forms than prohibition, to impose its tyrannical and proscriptive will upon the people of the United States? Already its history has vindicated the wisdom of the provision in the Maryland State constitution which prohibits any clergyman from being a member of the Maryland Legislature, and gives not a little point to the malignant observation of John Randolph of Roanoke that no countries are so badly governed as those that are governed by women, except such as are governed by priests. The climax of its aggressive insolence was reached when, as has now been established from its records by the Hearst press, its executive committee failed, on November 8, 1925, by a vote only to adopt a resolution which proposed to publish a manifesto address to the American people indicting President Coolidge of "misfeasance or malfeasance in office" and paving the way for his impeachment.

I have said so much about the abuses of prohibition that I have hardly left myself any time to say a word about the steps that should be taken to bring them to an end; but I have formed definite views upon that subject, which I have frequently expressed.

The first step should be to elect some such Democrat as Alfred E. Smith, of New York; Albert C. Ritchie, of Maryland; or JAMES A. REED, of Missouri; or some such Republican as Nicholas Murray Butler, of New York; James Wadsworth, of New York; or WALTER E. EDGE, of New Jersey, to the Presidency on a platform calling for the modification of the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment. The next step should be to modify the Volstead Act in such a manner as to permit the use of beer with as high an alcoholic content as can be produced without dishonest evasion of the eighteenth amendment. Both General Andrews and James Cooper Waddell, the recent head of the alcohol and brewery control squad of the Prohibition Unit, have expressed the opinion that the general use of such a beer would distinctly improve the present situation. It would, at least, tend to wipe out the grossly invidious discrimination against the less fortunate members of society which the practical workings of prohibition now make in favor of those who either own their own preprohibition stocks of liquor or can afford to pay high bootleg prices. In these academic walks it is peculiarly timely to remember that the Volstead Act was not passed by Congress except over the veto of that renowned alumnus of this institution, Woodrow Wilson.

The next step should be to amend the eighteenth amendment in such a manner as to empower Congress to establish a system of liquor control, compounded partly of Government supervision and partly of local option, akin to that which is now being administered with such brilliant results in the Province of Quebec. In four years the Quebec system of liquor control cut down drunkenness in Montreal by more than one-half, and it is steadily promoting the use of wine instead of whisky, which was one of Jefferson's cherished ideals. I have recently introduced into the Senate a bill looking to such a constitutional amendment as I have just suggested, and when the next Congress convenes I shall reintroduce it.

In conclusion let me add that I trust that what I have said in the course of my address has not been misconceived. With excess in drink I have no patience whatever. Throughout my life I have been one of the most temperate of men and, beyond drinking an occasional glass of wine or so, I do not drink any alcoholic beverage at all. I can truly say that I abhor drunkenness only less than I do prohibition; and I abhor prohibition more because it is not only a source of drunkenness itself but of moral and social abuses far worse than drunkenness. Even if prohibition prohibited, I should be opposed to it, believing as I do that it is based upon ethical extravagance and a totally false philosophy of life. Puritanism has never been a permanent phase of human history, but only a passing episode, for the simple reason that it imposes upon the normal and healthy attributes of human nature an intolerable burden of restriction. Not infrequently, as in the case of the English Puritan Commonwealth, it merely breeds back to lawlessness and vice. Man is not a vinegar bottle, though the prohibitionist would fain have him so. Rather is he, to recall the beautiful image of Coleridge, "a breathing house not made with hands," full of eager sensations, appetites, and desires, which do nothing but minister to his rational happiness so long as he does not gratify them to the extent of injuring himself or others. Temperately indulged, they are not less lawful than our moral and intellectual promptings. All our propensities and passions tend to excess; every one of them; and there is no man who might not, like John Randolph of Roanoke, smite himself over his heart with his fist and exclaim: "This rebel is ever in revolt." But it is also true that the same power which has clothed us with our warm garment of flesh has also endowed us with a reason and a conscience which are often far safer guides to human conduct than the artificial restraints of any constitution or statute, however imperious.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 11, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, January 10, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Look down, bend low, our Heavenly Father, and hold us in the shadow of Thy presence. With tenderness and compassion, O teach us the way to see, to reason, to act, and to bear our part that we may be a real blessing to our country. We are at our best only when we fulfill the purpose for which we are here. Make us keenly sensitive of our reputation and opportunities. By prolonged and studious effort help us to learn the most beautiful and valuable lessons of life. By the conquest of difficulties help us to live sweeter in our hearts and braver in our lives. Keep us better than the bad and make us equal to the best. At Thy altar we ask for the blessing of humility—the wonder grace that never boasts of victory and never leaves a pain. Be gracious to all our land and bless our citizens everywhere with peace and plenty. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 773. An act to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of the State of Iowa; and

S. 1968. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 483. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings.

SWEARING IN OF REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE S. GRAHAM, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, on January 5 I was appointed by the Speaker to administer the oath of office to my distinguished colleague, Mr. GEORGE S. GRAHAM, of Pennsylvania. Mr. GRAHAM was in the Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, and on January 9, pursuant to House Resolution 72, I swore Mr. GRAHAM in as a Member of the House. The oath was administered in conformity with the rules of the House, and I offer the following privileged resolution and move its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 84

Whereas GEORGE S. GRAHAM, a Representative for the State of Pennsylvania, from the second district thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed the oath of office before the Hon. ROYAL H. WELLER, authorized by resolution of this House to administer the oath, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said GEORGE S. GRAHAM as a Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, may I proceed by unanimous consent for one moment? Judge GRAHAM, our colleague, has undergone a most serious operation. It was not known for a while that he would survive the operation, but he has survived it and is now convalescent. It is my happy privilege to report to the House that Judge GRAHAM is doing very well and soon will be restored to his former good health and his position as an active Member of the House. [Applause.] However, in view of the fact that he is convalescing and will not for some time to come be able to be present on the floor of the House, I ask unanimous consent that an indefinite leave of absence be extended to him.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice, and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8269, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I offer, on page 40, line 6, to strike out the figures "$3,672,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,707,500."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was practically decided on yesterday, and before we take that up with the small attendance we have now I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the count). Mr. Chairman, many Members have come in since the Chair began to count, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 40, line 6, strike out the figures "$3,672,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,707,500."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, just before the House adjourned, I offered an amendment which was defeated, increasing this appropriation by $50,000. The chairman of the committee in charge of the bill made a most eloquent plea for the sake of economy. I have therefore reduced my amendment $15,000 and ask for an increase of $35,000.

There are 884 deputy marshals throughout the country. This small increase would enable the Attorney General to take care of an increase of salary for deputy marshals not only in New York but in Alaska and in every State of the Union. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] read from a report yesterday, according to which, on his own figures, over 200 of these deputy marshals are receiving $1,500 a year—$125 a month. I point out again that these marshals now, since the enactment of the prohibition laws, are intrusted with difficult and dangerous duties. They are required to serve papers in injunction and padlock cases, and the appellate courts have required actual personal service. Unless we have marshals who are contented, who are satisfied and properly paid, it is hardly to be expected that these men can perform their duties efficiently.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just one moment, please. I submit that a deputy marshal ought to be paid a salary at least corresponding to that of a police officer in his own community. There are cases that I can agree where a deputy marshal in a small community, where the court does not sit every day, receives sufficient pay when he gets $1,500 a year, but in a large city like New York, with the southern district and the eastern district, including Brooklyn, and in Alaska and in large cities where the court is in session every day and where these men work night and day, have car fares and are required to have their meals away from their homes, as they do not work within walking distance of their homes, it is simply disgraceful for the United States Government to expect these men to render good service with a compensation of $1,500 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Every Member present yesterday agreed with the distinguished gentleman from New York that such deputy marshals should receive more pay, but the chairman pointed out that his committee has already recommended an increase of over $100,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But we still have more than 215 men getting only $1,500 a year. Surely $35,000 is not going to break the United States Government to give the deputy marshals, carrying with them the emblem of the United States and representing the United States Government in enforcement of the law. I have no idea that all of this $35,000 will reach New York. I say it is ridiculous to come here and make speeches about the nonenforcement of law and then stand up here and refuse to give these men a decent wage. It is outrageous to expect a man in a large city to live on $1,500 a year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does the gentleman think there is no sincere and earnest effort at law enforcement by this administration?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am willing to give the drys everything they ask for to enforce the law. That is what I am asking for.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Maryland want it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I say let us give these people a decent wage.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, these men who devote their entire time to the business in New York get more than $3,500 a year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is a mistake. We have deputy marshals in New York City getting only $1,500 a year. They were recently increased $5 a month.

Mr. SNELL. I think the chairman ought to be able to clear this matter up, because it is important.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have additional time. I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE].

Mr. SHREVE. The facts in this situation are as follows: We have, all told, 902 men of this class. They are scattered all over the United States. Some of them are in the thickly populated districts such as that from which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] comes, and some are out on the prairies and scattered about widely. Now, there are men who do not earn this large amount of money that was allotted to them. There are others who might be classified at a little higher rate, perhaps, later on. Two of these deputies receive $3,100 and 4 receive $2,925, and 14 receive $2,657, and 74 receive $2,397, and so forth.

Mr. SNELL. Where do the special men in New York that we are talking about come in in connection with that list, if that is a fair question? I do not want to corner any man down.

Mr. SHREVE. We have these men classified——

Mr. SNELL. Yes; the gentleman from New York said they were working for $1,500. I did not think that that was so, but I think it ought to be cleared up.

Mr. SHREVE. There is a large number, 396, at $1,624, and then a smaller number, 50, in isolated parts of the United States where they receive only $1,402.

Mr. SNELL. That may be enough for those fellows, but I do feel that in the congested centers of population the Federal Government ought not to ask a man to give his entire time to its service for $1,500 a year. The statement has been made here repeatedly that that is what they are getting in the city of New York. It seems there should be some information somewhere that would tell us, so that there will be no further argument about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There are 396 who are getting $1,634.

Mr. SNELL. Where are they located?

Mr. SHREVE. These men are not located in New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have a larger number of $1,600 men in New York City proportionately than you have anywhere else. The increase they have received has been only $8 a month. You can not do anything with $8 a month in New York City.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Last year there was carried about $78,000 in the deficiency bill for the purpose of enabling the Attorney General in his discretion to grant increases to deputies where he thought increases were needed. That bill failed. This year we not only carry that $78,000 but an additional amount.

Mr. SNELL. That is, we never had it before?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We add to it, so that we are now carrying $100,000 more in order to grant increases where increases should be granted in the judgment of the Attorney General.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know the gentleman wants to be fair, but $15,000 of the $22,500 is for the increase of the salaries of the marshals, and only $7,500 is to increase the salaries of 804 deputy marshals. The increases contemplated last year include the rates of salaries which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] mentioned. I have here a letter from the Attorney General in which he states that the department would be glad to fix the compensation of deputies in accordance with my suggestion, but he adds that, as a matter of fact, the funds available will not permit it for the coming fiscal year. That letter was signed by Assistant Attorney General Marshall, who is in charge of United States and deputy marshals.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will say that the Attorney General before our committee had no suggestion to make in regard to this increase of salary.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Just one moment. How long would it take to get from the Department of Justice a statement as to what the deputy marshals in New York City get? I would like to have that complete.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is all very well to stand here and demand increased appropriations every day on every line of every bill. The Committee on Appropriations has stated all the facts in this particular case. They have presented the facts to you. We have given in the deficiency bill and in this bill $100,000 for the particular service to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and others have just addressed themselves—more than they ever had before. There has been no demand from any source anywhere except such demands as the gentleman from New York makes on the floor for this increase. The administrative side of the Government has made no demand.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment. No demand has been made. If they want more money, as a rule there is no reason why they should not ask for it. In the consideration of this problem we have realized that some little shortage may have existed, and we are carrying more in the bill than was requested by the Attorney General or by the Budget.

Just a few days ago the House voted almost unanimously to reduce taxes and to take away the revenue that the higher taxes would give to the Treasury for the payment of obligations such as these. I was one of those who voted against it. There is not any money with which to meet these increased obligations. You can assume the responsibility if you will, but if there is a deficit as a result of these increased demands, do not blame anyone but yourselves. Do not vote for every motion to increase the compensation of everybody irrespective of whether justice applies to the case or not. Keep the expenses within the revenues of the Government. Let the Nation stand by the record which it has made since the war. I appeal to every Member here to stand for an economical administration of national affairs by voting down every amendment that may be offered irrespective of whether it is just or not. I know there will be other amendments offered and I say in advance that they ought not to pass. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have the greatest regard, as do all the Members of the House, for the subcommittee in charge of this bill, but there is a real necessity for increasing the salaries of some of the deputy marshals. I know it to be a fact not only from what has been stated here as to other places but because of conditions which exist in my own city, where we have deputy marshals who are giving their whole time to their work and who are receiving, some of them, less than $1,600. I read the figures: Jennings, $2,500; Kennedy, $1,860; Morrisey, $1,560; Elton, $1,500; Hartstein, $1,500; Puls, $1,500; and Colgan, $1,440, per annum. We have in our city, as in many of the great cities, most important duties for which our deputy marshals are called upon to do. Among them is the enforcement of the prohibition laws. There is a great temptation for graft in prohibition matters amongst the officials of the courts because of the low salaries paid. I have the greatest respect for the deputy marshals as a whole, and I know the deputy marshals in my district are thoroughly honest and upright, but to expect too much from a man who gives all of his time to the responsible duties which a marshal is called upon to perform on a salary of less than $1,600 per year, where he can not obtain a decent place to live without paying at least $50 a month, is entirely wrong. I think Congress itself made a mistake some years ago when it authorized the Attorney General to fix the salaries of United States attorneys and marshals, as well as their assistants, up to a certain amount. We should not have delegated to the Executive the power to do that which solely ought to rest upon the Congress itself.

The Department of Justice has not been equitable in the distribution of the salary increases throughout the country. I know that is so, especially from the report of the Attorney General for the last year. In my own State we have two districts. He is authorized by legislation to fix the salaries of the district attorneys and of the marshals up to a certain maximum.

His report shows that in one district the work is far below that of the other district in the prosecution of crime and in the money that is paid into the Government, yet we have him paying the district attorney in the western district $1,000 a year more than he pays the attorney in the eastern district; and he pays the marshal in the western district $500 more than he pays the marshal in the other district, yet the work in the eastern district is far ahead of the other district. So it is with deputy marshals and assistant United States attorneys. One of them at St. Louis receives as low as $2,400 per annum. That is the amount paid to an assistant United States attorney who gives all of his time to the work of the enforcement of the prohibition law. He is an able and an efficient lawyer, with a family. He is giving all of his time to the Government at $200 per month. That is one of the results of putting into the hands of the Department of Justice the power to fix the salaries.

They say they have enough money to increase the pay, according to the statements of some gentlemen of the House; but they told me not so long ago that they can not increase the salaries of deputy marshals and deputy clerks in St. Louis or the salaries of assistant district attorneys in St. Louis because they have not enough money. When you give small pay to men engaged in the enforcement of law and the riddance of the community of crime and force incompetent men to be appointed or force men to live upon a meager salary you are wasting the people's money instead of saving it. [Applause.]

I believe, Mr. Chairman, the committee itself ought to cooperate and give the Department of Justice enough money so that the Attorney General can not say to the gentleman from New York, to others, and myself that they have not enough money to increase salaries so that men occupying these important positions can live comfortably and the department can pay a living wage to them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 44, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans.: For the United States penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., including not to exceed $270,000, for salaries and wages of all officers and employees, $880,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen—and ladies, I do not feel that we ought to allow this paragraph of the bill to perfunctorily pass without calling attention to the overcrowded conditions in the Federal prisons. We are appropriating $880,000 for Leavenworth, $852,500 for Atlanta, and $332,500 for McNeil Island. Here is an annual outlay of over $2,000,000, an apparently large sum, and it might seem that we are doing our full duty; but the blazing fact stands forth that these Federal penitentiaries are wholly inadequate. They are so disgracefully overcrowded as to be a menace to the health and morals, not only of the inmates, but of every community in the land to which released criminals return upon the conclusion of their imprisonment.

OVERCROWDING

On June 30, 1918, the population in the Federal penitentiaries was 4,482, which even then taxed their capacity. On June 30, 1927, the prison inmates had increased to 9,448. This is an increase of 4,966 within a period of nine years.

The capacity of Leavenworth is about 1,600. Its population, in November, 1927, when the superintendent gave his testimony before the committee, was 3,406. When our committee visited the institution in 1925, we found, even then, that men and boys were sleeping in an improvised, poorly lighted dormitory in the basement. In Atlanta, Ga., the capacity of the prison is about the same as that of Leavenworth—1,600. Its population in November, 1927, was 3,160, and the basement was also used as a dormitory. The only Federal prison that is at all equipped for the population which it maintains is McNeil Island. In Leavenworth and Atlanta prisons cells intended for one prisoner are improvised to hold two and three; those intended for three are rigged up temporarily to hold six. Halls and corridors are commandeered to accommodate prisoners in the most primitive fashion in disgraceful propinquity. And yet that goes on year after year—and Congress does nothing.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

DUTY OF CONGRESS—PROVIDE MORE PRISONS

Mr. SHREVE. Does the gentleman recall that the committee of which we are both members, upon several occasions has recommended legislation touching upon these very questions? If so, I wish the gentleman would mention that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Indeed, I do; and I am making this public statement now on the floor of this House in order that the membership may be acquainted with conditions and in order that the legislative committee, which I do not mean to reflect on in any sense whatever, may realize its importance. They may probably resent our intrusion upon their field—I do not know.

SEPARATE PRISON COLONIES FOR YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS

Nevertheless I want to make a recommendation, and it is one that is concurred in by the superintendent of prisons, namely, that different types of prisoners ought to be separated and each type scrupulously segregated.

It is a disgrace to keep murderers, thieves, cutthroats, and degenerates in daily contact with those who are held for lesser offenses—many of whom are first offenders. In laying out a plan of construction, it is primarily essential, I submit to you, that exclusive prisons should be maintained for the worst offenders—those who have been in prison before, those who are guilty of crimes involving a high degree of moral turpitude; whereas young men who have fallen from grace for the first time ought to be segregated in separate farm colonies. They should not be confined in daily contact with hardened criminals, which the present meagre prison accommodations inevitably necessitate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. So much for the odious crimes, the crimes which are like a disease, contagious and demoralizing in their influence upon younger men who have fallen for the first time.

SEPARATE PRISONS FOR DRUG ADDICTS

There is another class of criminals who are also piled into these overcrowded institutions who ought not to be there. I refer to drug addicts and drug peddlers. They are now overrunning all the prisons.

Just look at the figures of the increase in drug addicts in our Federal prisons since 1918. On June 30, 1918, there were 299 drug addicts and peddlers in the Federal penitentiaries. At the present moment there are 2,116. A jump in nine years of over 1,800. The problem has been: "What shall be done with them?" For want of better facilities they have been stuck in criminal institutions—a wholly unjust proceeding. They are not criminals, but only potentially so, in the sense that drug addiction is the foundation of many crimes.

The drug addict first loses his moral sense and then drops naturally into crime. Where you have in institutions like Leavenworth 600 or 700 drug addicts, just imagine the effect of the contact of those men with prisoners who have never known its use. It means an inevitable extension of the vice. We ought to have separate institutions for drug addicts, where they can be kindly treated and where the possibility of their dragging down others may be avoided.

ABOLISH "TRUSTIES"

My third recommendation—which will, perhaps, not be popular—is an increase of appropriation for guards and for employees of the prisons.

I think it is a mistake to employ criminals in duties connected with the administration of prisons. It is false economy. The custom that has grown up of taking prisoners by favor from their cells, sending them on errands outside of the prison walls, allowing them to cook for the keeper's table, to do work in the kitchen of the prison, and to give them generally free play. These men are called "trusties"—they ought to be abolished.

The dangerous part of such a policy is this: It is fundamentally un-American. It is unjust and it is unfair to other prisoners, because it leads to favoritism. We can easily visualize, for instance, the influence that is brought to bear upon the warden. He ought to be kept free from such influence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. These trusties are favorites of the warden and officers of the institution. They are given carte blanche. As I said, they drive the prison car, they go outside the walls to make purchases, they are in and out of the prison doors all day long every day of the week. What harm is there in that, you say, outside of the mere favoritism that is implied and the injustice to other prisoners? The harm is this, that that is one of the methods by which drugs are smuggled into the prison, and it leads to an increase of the drug habit in all institutions.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Does it not violate the sentence of the court to a term of hard labor. Is it not almost a contempt of the court to use a man on the outside of the prison?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am glad my colleague asked that question. My answer is yes it is in violation of the law and in contempt of the sentence of the court. It is also in contempt of society.

This Congress in making the laws imposes the penalty, and this abuse violates the law and flouts the sentence imposed by the court.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am in hearty sympathy and I think the full committee is with the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York for a building for drug addicts. That is absolutely essential in view of the overpopulation of the prison; there is danger and unless the Judiciary Committee takes the matter up we may have serious consequences to follow.

But in so far as he criticizes the using of youths as trusties, the gentleman is challenging a custom that is 100 years old in every prison, State and Federal, likewise in every elemosynary institution for the mentally weak. It is one method in testing in advance those for whom parole may be given. Likewise it is humanitarian because they like employment, and if there is one weakness in the prison system it is that they are not provided with adequate employment.

The gentleman from New York saw the farms and the dairy at Leavenworth, where they were sent, and that they went gladly that they might find something to do. You drive a person crazy, you destroy his health, unless you give him something to do. Many of them have been found generally trustworthy, and thereby earned the recommendation for parole.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. My colleague, a member of the committee, I think has misapprehended the purport and the effect of my recommendation with respect to trusties. He weaves into a protest against overturning an ancient custom, the argument that it is essential to keep prisoners employed.

Of course, it is necessary to keep them employed; they ought to be, for the reason which he so well expresses, but are there no other ways to employ them except in avenues and in places and by giving them opportunities to do mischief such as this ancient custom has encouraged?

I am speaking by the card; I am speaking from personal knowledge. I know that drugs have gone and are going into prisons every day through the medium of the trusties. It is a bad custom, and even though it has been sanctioned for 100 years it is a bad custom. I do not mean to close the prisoners up; I would not lock them in a cell and put them on bread and water, as my friend from Alabama would imply. I am as much concerned as he to see that they are kept at work, but I do insist that if a man is sent to jail as a criminal he ought to be in jail and remain in jail. He ought always to have the consciousness that he was sent there by society for an infraction of its laws.

There are other ways of being kind to prisoners without taking them out of the prison, to the discouragement of other men locked up in cells, and have them loiter around the warden's house fixing up his garden, cooking his meals, driving his auto, and running errands into town. It is a positive scandal and a menace to proper prison administration. It ought to be abolished, notwithstanding it may have had the sanction of 100 years. The very essence of punitive law is justice. Any departure from equity in the treatment of prisoners can not help but have an unfavorable reaction on their minds. If they see that some of their number, by reason of political pull, bribery, or social influence, are given wide liberty as trusties, the routine labor and restraint of confinement becomes irksome; and they carry with them, when they go beyond the prison walls, a deep resentment and sense of hopelessness which make them an easy prey to their old associates. Thus they become second and third offenders.

ALL PRISONERS SHOULD HAVE WORK TO DO

If we should abolish the "trusty system," it does not follow that they would be kept in idleness. The fact that there is not enough work to go around now is our fault. We should not be stumped by that; we should provide work for all. The hearings on this bill disclose the fact that that is the great problem which the wardens have to meet. That they are doing it as well as can be expected is not to be denied, and even their use of trusties can be excused under the present system. The fault is not with the wardens of the jails but with the system, and it is the "system" which cries aloud for change. We ought to provide an adequate number of prisons—segregating and separating prisoners, as I suggested—and we—I mean Congress—should provide such facilities as will enable every prisoner to be usefully employed; but never, under any circumstances, should they be assigned to pet positions that discriminate against other prisoners and which make them feel that they are on vacation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Federation Industrial Institution for Women, Alderson, W. Va.: For the Federal Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va., including not to exceed $90,000 for salaries and wages of all officers and employees, $260,000.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUGHES: Page 43, line 8, strike out the word "Federation" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Federal." On line 11 strike out the figures "$90,000" and insert "$100,000," and in line 12 strike out the figures "$260,000" and insert "$270,000."

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the committee I would say that the striking out of the word "Federation" and inserting the word "Federal" is merely correcting a typographical error.

The total increase on this appropriation will be $10,000. If this appropriation remains at the present amount, this institution can take care of only 150 people. With this small addition of $10,000 it will enable them to take care of 300 people. All of the buildings at this institution will be finished by the latter part of May. This appropriation will not begin until July 1. This information has come to the subcommittee, and I am satisfied that they will recommend to the House the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, at the time we considered this appropriation Miss Harris, who is the very able superintendent of the institution, was not able to appear before the committee. With the information we had at that time we felt that we could make a cut of $10,000 under the estimate made by the Bureau of the Budget. However, upon more mature consideration and having talked with Miss Harris and heard from the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES], we decided to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Probation system, United States courts: For salaries and actual expenses of probation officers, as provided by section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a probation system in the United States courts, except in the District of Columbia," approved March 4, 1925, $25,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: Page 47, line 4, after the figures "1925," strike out "$25,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, in March, 1925, in the closing hours, I think, of the Sixty-eighth Congress, the House passed a bill under suspension of the rules virtually without consideration of the merits, providing for the establishment of a probation system in the United States courts. I opposed the passage of the bill for reasons that I thought sufficient at the time, but I was one of a very small minority who took that position, and the bill was passed virtually unanimously by the House. That law has been in operation now since March, 1925, and gives very broad authority and latitude to the Federal judges in the matter of suspending sentences of persons convicted of crimes in the Federal courts, and further provides for the appointment of probation officers. I have offered this amendment which, on the face of it, doubles the appropriation which the committee brought in for this work. As a matter of fact, however, it only carries the appropriation up to the amount that was appropriated in the first bill. We first appropriated for this very important work, $50,000. That was the amount deemed advisable to provide for the probation system in the Federal courts. In the last Congress that amount was cut to $30,000, and in this Congress it is proposed to cut it to $25,000. I fear that in the next Congress it will be cut to $10,000, and in the next eliminated altogether, thereby bringing about the condition that I very much feared would happen when we passed the legislation, to wit, giving a broad power of suspended sentence to Federal judges, with absolutely no supervising control or supervision over the men who are allowed to go at large after having violated the law.

We have listened with great interest to-day to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], who has given us the figures on the very crowded condition of the penal institutions in America. I have some figures that I shall put into the RECORD to-day, which show the manner in which this probation system has worked, at least in one Federal jurisdiction in the United States. I speak of the southern jurisdiction of West Virginia, not a jurisdiction in my district, but represented here by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Judge STROTHER, who is away on account of sickness. I feel sure that if he were here he would be glad to put these figures into the RECORD. In that district, since this law was passed by Congress, March 4, 1925, to June 1, 1927, a period of a little over two years, the Federal court paroled 1,690 offenders. That period that I have mentioned of a little over two years was a period from March, 1925, to June, 1927, and during that period he had no probation officer. One thousand six hundred and ninety prisoners were given suspended sentence under the provisions of this law. Only 145 of those violated their parole or were ever called to account again for violating the confidence that had been reposed in them by the court.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Were not those prisoners largely mine strikers?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all. I will put the detailed statement of the cases into the RECORD. The large majority of those were prohibition cases, many of them first offenders.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I asked in regard to mine strikers.

Mr. WOODRUM. There were very few mine cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They would not be in the Federal court.

Mr. WOODRUM. No. The majority of them were prohibition cases, some of them first offenders. Two hundred and nine of them were women. The judge there is a very conscientious man, trying hard to enforce the law. He put those people out on probation. During that period he had no probation officer to go around and supervise them or try to rehabilitate them or bring them back into society as law-abiding and self-respecting citizens. Yet without that supervision only 145 of them were ever heard of again in the matter of violating any law. In June, 1927, he asked the Department of Justice for a probation officer, and he was given to him, certified by the Civil Service Commission—a splendid, fine young man, to take charge of probation work, and from June, 1927, to January 1, 1928, there were 397 cases in that judicial district, composed of 24 counties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. During that period there were 397 people put out on probation in the hands of this probation officer, and only 4 were ever brought before the court for committal.

Now, gentlemen, I do not know how that impresses you, but coming as it does right on the heels of this remarkable statement by our chairman about the penal institutions being crowded, I bring you knowledge and information as to where the prisons can be relieved of some of this crowd. In the case of these several hundreds of prisoners put out on probation and helped back to decency, the Government has been saved the space required to house them and the expense of guarding them and boarding them. But more important than all that is the fact that those prisoners were brought back to society as law-abiding and self-respecting citizens. This group of citizens were taken out of the column of liabilities and put into the column of assets in the records of society. Now, unless we are going to give to the Federal courts sufficient funds to enable courts to have competent probation officers to help these men going on probation to secure employment and provide for themselves, and do everything they can possibly do to put them on a self-sustaining and law-abiding basis, the greatest benefit of the probation system will be lost. We ought to provide the funds.

This jurisdiction that has produced this remarkable result gets $2,900 a year from the Department of Justice for its probation work. Twenty-four hundred dollars of that fund is used in the salary of the probation officer, $200 a month; he gets as an expense account $500, or $125 each quarter. He must attend the court wherever it meets and must supervise the conduct of these men in 24 separate counties. He got that amount last year under our appropriation of $30,000. If you reduce it to $25,000, that will reduce the portion going to this district to about $2,500. I submit that Congress ought to back up the courts in their effort to save these men and rehabilitate them and put them back to society as self-respecting citizens. I simply offer this amendment to restore the amount to $50,000, the amount estimated for this important work.

Before I take my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks a letter from George W. McClintic and a letter from the probation officer, and a short statistical report.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following are the papers referred to:

CHARLESTON, W. VA., December 27, 1927.

HON. GEORGE W. MCCLINTIC,
Judge United States District Court,
Southern District of West Virginia, Charleston, W. Va.

DEAR SIR: Submitted herewith is a statistical report of probation for the southern district of West Virginia from March 4, 1925, to January 1, 1928.

The statistics from March 4, 1925, to June 1, 1927, were taken from the court records and other available sources, consequently a study over that period could not be made. From June 1, 1927, to January 1, 1928, a rather close study of probation as applied in this district has been made.

I wish to cite your attention to the following, taken from the statistical report:

From March 4, 1925, to January 1, 1927, there have been 1,481 men and 209 women placed on probation, making a total of 1,690. Out of this number, only 145 have been committed for violation of probation, 134 men and 11 women. Basing these figures on percentage, the following is shown: 9.05 per cent of men and 5.3 per cent of women have been committed for violation of probation, or 8.58 per cent of the whole number placed on probation.

Out of 397 persons placed on probation since June 1, 1927, only four men and no women have been committed. Two of the four violated their probation the same day they were placed on probation, one within 10 days, and one within 30 days.

You will note that this report is divided into two parts, as follows: March 4, 1925, to June 1, 1927, and from June 1, 1927, to January 1, 1928. This division was made in order that an accurate account of probation under the supervision could be followed up in the future.

It is encouraging to the probation officer to note that probation in this district could be made tremendously valuable to the Federal Government, the State, and public at large, even as much so as to the lawbreaker, which advantage has already been definitely proven.

The probation officer has made several observations which would be of very material aid to the success of probation in this district if they could be worked out, namely, a larger expense allowance, stenographer, and an auto. If these three assets could be realized, the probation office would have an opportunity to get out of the office and organize the work in the field. As your honor knows, the success of probation lies in its enforcement and in personal contact and supervision of the homes of the probationers. It is hoped that in course of time these visions may become a reality.

I wish, above all, to express my thanks and appreciation to your honor for the kindness and cooperation given me at all times. This has been of great help to me.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN W. BOLICK,
United States Probation Officer.

CHARLESTON, W. VA., January 4, 1928.

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I inclose herewith a report of the activities of the probation department of my court.

It shows the number placed on probation in the years 1925, 1926, and 1927.

It also shows the number who have since been tried and committed, and the number that are still on probation.

I also inclose a copy of a letter of the probation officer which sets out the situation a little more fully.

What we lack is more supervision, and we can only get this if we get a larger appropriation. There was only appropriated last year $30,000 for the United States. I am informed that the Budget recommendation carries that amount for this year.

This district gets $2,400 salary for one paid probation officer and he has $500 for his expenses. This is divided into quarterly payments of $125 each. His home is here in Charleston, but he has to attend court in Huntington and attend court in Bluefield, and if court is held at Williamson, Lewisburg, or Webster Springs he will have to attend there. This eats up, practically speaking, all the expense money. He has no opportunity of going into the 24 counties of this district outside of those where court is held, and build up an organization and get local probation officers to act. These local men can not be paid, but they are entitled to their expenses.

You will note from the copy of the letter of Mr. Bolick that he would like to have a stenographer and an automobile. One must appreciate that the correspondence in connection with his work is very large, and he tries to keep in touch thereby with all these people, but it is a physical impossibility to do more than so much. However, I think that the Government could easily amend its statute so that the probation officer could be like a prohibition officer; that is, get one of the confiscated automobiles. I notice in the morning paper an advertisement by the marshal of 35 confiscated automobiles, and I would certainly like to see the probation law amended so that the probation officer can get one in the same way that prohibition agents now get them—that is, by an order of court, setting aside some confiscated automobile for the use of the probation officer.

We will forget the stenographer part just now, and hope that a larger appropriation can be made for expenses. If you could get that, with the increase of the hard roads, the probation officer could travel over these 24 counties and visit a great many of the individuals whom it is now impossible to see.

I know that you will appreciate the fact that of this large number on probation there would be an average of three to four hundred of them in jail if it were not for the probation law. This would entail an expense of probably not less than $300 a day for the keep of the prisoners, which money would have to be paid by the United States. It would also require the counties to expend greater or less sums in keeping the families of those that are in jail.

Taking the average of $300 a day saved, you will readily see that it makes $9,000 a month, and certainly the Government could afford to appropriate $500 a month for probation work in this district. The probation—leaving out of view the good thing of trying to make better citizens—is an actual big money saver for the Government, but it will require the expenditure of some money to make the system any sort of a success.

The paid probation officer came here from Richmond, Va., where he had had experience in probation work. He was certified to me from the civil-service department, and I appointed him. He should have an increase in salary of at least $300 a month, but we really need the expense money at this time more strongly than we need this increase in salary.

If anything occurs to you after going over these papers, and you need any additional information, I will be glad to furnish it if it is in my power.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

GEORGE W. MCCLINTIC,
District Judge.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the very eloquent address made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], I will say that the system is not popular among the judges. We were surprised a year ago, when we wrote to the judges of the United States, to find that very few of them were well impressed with the system. Some of them have their own systems. I know of one case where a retired street-car man has served as a probationary agent, and he is able to contribute from his own pocket several thousand dollars a year to the support of those boys. All over the country you find those generous-minded people.

I want first to let you know what the superintendent of prisons has to say about it himself. Here is what he says to the question propounded by the chairman, "Do you know how many appointments have been made?"

The answer was:

Mr. CONNER. Yes, sir; three. There have been 10 districts where salaries have been approved and where the judges wanted the probation officers. The Civil Service Commission held examinations by civil-service districts, and the judges did not want to appoint probation officers from outside of their judicial districts. So there are seven of them who have made no appointments. Three of them have made appointments, these being the southern West Virginia district, the southern New York district, and Massachusetts. The other seven authorized have not as yet made appointments. I expect they will do so soon, because the Civil Service Commission has now held examination by judicial districts and the eligible lists will be available shortly for the selection of probation officers.

Only 10 in the whole United States.

Now, I leave it to the committee to say if we have not already appropriated enough money to carry them through another year under the prevailing circumstances. The committee reduced the estimates of the Budget only $20,000. We cut it down to conform to the facts of the case, to $25,000, and I think it should stand there.

Mr. WOODRUM. I understand, then, that the appropriation of $25,000 for this work will not necessarily curtail the probationary work already being done?

Mr. SHREVE. I think not.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman understands that this same jurisdiction will have at least the same amount they had in the past?

Mr. SHREVE. I think so. That is a matter that is entirely in the hands of the department.

Mr. WOODRUM. In other words, they have the funds if they want to do it?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] amazed me very much, that the judges themselves oppose the appointment of probation officers. I have had considerable experience with the probation service in the city of New York, and I find there that the judges who have had large experience with it are the most enthusiastic backers of it. The reactionary tendencies of the Federal court judges is what astonishes me now.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman refers to the appointment of probation officers. He did not refer to paid officers. There is a distinction between the two. The United States Government pays the officers, but there are many men who do not receive any compensation at all.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I will say as to both of the cases that there should not be any opposition of any character. There should be no objection to paying a man and making his work a responsible work under the court, to make it possible for a judge to discharge him if he violates the duties imposed upon him. He should continue in office for a long time and know his job. To my mind, that is the essential thing in the probation system. We can get a lot of officers to come in and spend what time they can spare in this service, but we will never get anywhere by that means. This voluntary service in New York is only auxiliary to the paid service. The paid service is the most important thing. It is all important to have trained men and women who give every hour of their time to the work, who consult with the judge, who are a part of the court. I do not see how a judge can sentence a man until he first has had the investigation of the probation officer. The old hit-and-miss impressionistic system of imposing the penalties of the law is an outrage. The probation officer goes out and outlines the life of the defendant in the most complete report and gives the judge the basis upon which he can fix his sentence. The judges ought to welcome that. To sentence a man by mere guesswork is to take a fearful responsibility.

The penalty of the law is pretty nearly the whole law on the criminal end of the game and penalties should not be imposed as they are imposed by some judges.

A defendant will be brought in, and the judge, looking down from his throne, will say to himself:

"I know this type of fellow. I'll teach this rough-looking specimen a lesson."

Then he imposes a sentence in that egotistical spirit. I thought that that method had passed away. Probation was devised to destroy it. When a penalty is imposed in that way you have tyranny.

The probation officer, to my mind, is the greatest aid to the judge in making an intelligent sentence. The first thing a probation officer does is to give information to the judge as to who the defendant is. He is not a man who solicits men to go on probation. He tells the judge when a man ought to go to jail, and he tells the judge the kind of a man who ought never to go on probation. It shocks me to think that some judges are dealing in a haphazard way with the probation system, where the soul of the court is involved.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] says the judges appoint volunteers. I have a great respect for volunteers. But they are not a group with official responsibility. Too many of them play at probation. It is a fad with them. The most important moment in the life of a defendant is when he stands before the court for sentence. It may be the turning point between redemption and destruction. It is no time for piecework service of volunteers. When the Congress of the country has determined that the work shall be in the hands of paid officials, the judges should obey the law and appoint the men. Yet they have not done so. We passed the law and gave them the money. Some judges think that laws are not made for them to obey. Congress is progressive. The courts defy our laws. Many judges are reactionary little monarchs. We ought to have volunteer judges and try that out for a while.

It is a well-recognized fact among people who are not suffering from crippled intellects that probation officers should be selected because of education, character, and zeal for social service. Schools of sociology have sprung up all over the country to train men and women for this service. Courses in colleges are open to them. They must pass severe tests to enter the service of the State courts. In the face of this great educational effort we hear of Federal judges resisting the chance to secure the service of these highly trained people. They still hold to the old, bungling, irresponsible system of appointing good-hearted volunteers.

I have seen the work of privately paid volunteers. They are people who are connected with hospitals, with charitable organizations, and institutions of that character. They help the probation officer put the man on his feet after he has been put on probation. They render a marvelous service. But the probation officer is the man who makes recommendations to the judge as to the sentence. He is the man who tells the judge all about the man—where he came from, what he is capable of doing, and what his home problems are. Only a responsible and paid officer can render that aid to a judge in a responsible way.

I say it is a discredit to the bench that they have not seen to it that these probation officers are appointed and appointed promptly, and a great many of them. We find in New York City that one probation officer can handle about 50 men at a time, and that is all, and if in your Federal court service you are only going to appoint three men in the United States your probation system is a collapse. It is a failure. I feel discouraged when I learn that such a magnificent system is not receiving better support.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman probably knows, as I well know, that in the United States Court for the Southern District of New York there are six Federal judges and there is only one probation officer.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes; and he is a very fine man. Mr. George Daly is a capable officer, honorable and intelligent. He should have a staff of men.

Mr. CELLER. He has to take care of thousands of men.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I know Mr. Daly. He is a very experienced, very able, and very conscientious man, and with thousands of prisoners to handle, his work must be almost impossible. Anyone who knows probation knows that. I am speaking not so much against the recommendations of the committee but against the courts themselves because of the attitude they seem to assume with reference to this probation system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. When a man is put on probation he receives the full mercy of the court. It is not a pardon, but it is a punishment without walls. The mercy of the court ought not to be flouted; it ought to be safeguarded because it is the most precious power the court has for the redemption of a human being who has gone wrong. When a probation officer has a man put on probation he notes his conduct and the mercy of the court is safeguarded by the observation of a responsible man. I do not know of anything we ought to safeguard more preciously than the mercy of the court. We do not want it wasted and disrespected. We do not want judges to become hard-hearted and chilled by a violation of the terms under which they grant mercy without having that violation reported promptly. Therefore we ought to have these men to check up on what men under probation do with the mercy of the court. They ought to prove themselves worthy of that mercy through every hour that they are on probation, and then, indeed, we will find that we can trust hundreds who are now thrown into jail. To thrust a young fellow into jail for his first offense is a crime, unless the crime is so repugnant that it is impossible to find anything good in the fellow which would call for putting him on probation. That is the intent of probation, to encourage him and to lift him up.

In the Bronx our two great judges know the value of probation. The reports they receive are the last word in the science of probation. They would not think of sending a man to prison or putting him on probation until they had gathered through their probation service every item of knowledge that it was possible to procure. Let the Federal judges learn from Judge Cohn and Judge Barrett how to sentence men strongly, intelligently, justly, and mercifully. The Federal judges ought to go to a school presided over by these two men.

One of the greatest judges in New York, Judge McAdoo, together with another remarkable judge, Judge Brough, direct probation in the magistrate's court in New York. I have seen them night after night bring in these people who were on probation. The probation officer would make his report and they would consider every problem. They would attempt to see that a man on probation had work, that his children were given hospitalization, and they would render all kinds of encouragement, so that those on probation would have every incentive to lift themselves up. They have established a probation court where all of the problems of the men on probation are handled. No man is discharged from probation without a review of his record by this court. Chief Probation Officer Cooley, who is a leader of probation in New York, is entitled to high praise for his great work.

I have seen probation rise up until it is a civic religion and a glorious achievement in the spirituality of the Government, and I want to see probation in the Federal courts lifted up in the same way.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I was wondering whether the gentleman had in mind the probation of William Hickman in California?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Oh, I am not talking about such men as William Hickman in California. Very often even Congressmen elected to this body, which is supposed to be selected from the most perfect human beings in the United States, prove to be defectives. We have people on probation who should be in jail, and people in jail who should be on probation. When you build a real probation system that will end. The question for the gentleman to answer is whether he is in favor of mercy and fair treatment to boys and young first offenders or not. When he answers that question I will know whether he favors probation or not.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What is in the gentleman's mind is this: That I think there is too much coddling of criminals in this country and that that has brought about the situation we have to-day.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. This is not coddling of criminals. The probation service, if the gentleman knows anything about it, first helps to select the man who should go to jail and at the same time it also helps to select the man who should not go to jail. The man who should go to jail goes to jail under the report of the probation officer; and the man who should not is let out on trial and is observed while he is out, and is sent back the minute he breaks the terms of his probation.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Is it not a fact that, under the various probation systems in the United States, probation does not extend to those convicted of the crime of murder?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. It does not, although I think in Massachusetts at one time they did put somebody on probation who had committed murder.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Yesterday I asked the chairman of the Immigration Committee to withdraw his charge that Governor Smith was protecting alien criminals so that, as he said, they might remain here, be naturalized, and vote the Tammany ticket. It is absolutely without foundation in fact, and the complete facts as established in correspondence between Governor Smith and Secretary of Labor Davis show there was no justification for such a statement.

The gentleman making the attack on the dignity and decency of a whole State withheld information that is due the Members of the House. He withheld the fact that the Solicitor General of the Labor Department, when asked to rule on Governor Smith's position, found the latter was completely right in his contention. The Department of Labor admits that new law is needed to correct the situation; their solicitor general rules that the existing method of deporting alien criminals must be overhauled, that it has been illegal. And yet the Immigration Committee chairman not only withholds this information, but refuses to expunge his remarks from the RECORD in the face of these facts.

Here are the facts: The Labor Department insists that the States must turn over alien criminals as they leave the penitentiaries, so that they can be deported. In some cases, of course, where such aliens are liable to deportation, this is done by every State in the Union. But many prisoners are often let out on parole. They may later be pardoned by the pardon board. During that parole period they are under the jurisdiction of the State. The State owes it to its own dignity and protection to keep them under surveillance. If deported immediately upon the end of their sentence, they are deprived of a chance of pardon and restoration of citizenship. They are deprived of due process of law.

It is this class which the State of New York will not give up to the Federal Government with undue haste. Mind you, the Federal Government is receiving New York's cooperation with regard to men clearly liable to deportation. There is no dispute about that. And the other class—the paroled prisoners—can be deported if no pardon is granted during the period of parole.

Now, why is the Federal Government—and the chairman of the Immigration Committee—complaining? Merely because the Budget Bureau will not grant the Labor Department sufficient funds to find men who ought to be deported. They can always be picked up after they have left the prison and expiration of the parole period has terminated the State's jurisdiction. But the Budget Bureau will not give the Labor Department enough money to carry out the provisions of the immigration law.

And in their anger at the Budget Bureau, and their partisan rage, they seek to throw the burden of responsibility in this situation on Governor Smith. If money is what they need to enforce the law, and if they can not get enough to enforce it, the blame lies with the present administration and nobody else.

The gentleman also made the statement that a supreme court judge, sitting in the county of the Bronx, city of New York, had naturalized 10,000 applicants in one day. I called the attention of the House to the fact that this was a physical impossibility. I have just received a telegram from Robert L. Moran, county clerk of Bronx County, embraced in New York City, addressed to me:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: So that you may convey to Congressman JOHNSON of Washington the facts regarding naturalization in Bronx County, permit me to inform you that about 10,000 applicants will be heard during the month of January, beginning the 5th and ending January 31.

The chairman of the Immigration Committee tried to give the impression these 10,000 men would be heard in one day.

Court hearings start at 9.45 a. m. until 4 p. m. The record is as follows: January 5, 385; January 6, 373; January 9, 376. Total for three days, 1,134.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for another minute in order to finish the reading of this telegram.

Mr. CLARKE. Will the gentleman make it two minutes in order that I may ask a question?

Mr. CELLER. I hope the gentleman will make it three minutes, because I want to ask a question also.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for three additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN (continuing):

Fifteen employees of my office, two Federal examiners, and five court officers are handling applicants. All applicants have followed every provision of law and Federal examiners are in attendance with Government reports in each case. All must read and write English, and their good reputation testified to by two representative citizens who appear in court and have known them for more than five years.

ROBERT L. MORAN, County Clerk.

This disposes of the contention of the gentleman that 10,000 men were going to be naturalized in one day.

I am now ready to answer any questions.

Mr. CLARKE. Does not the gentleman think the routine of naturalization could be raised out of the dull monotony in which it is now by having, say, four particular days of each year devoted to conferring citizenship upon these men and at such times have the people who are to become naturalized gathered together in certain convenient places and give some dignity to the distinction that is to be conferred upon them? Does not the gentleman think this would be very helpful?

Mr. BOYLAN. I think it would be, and in a measure, we carry that out in New York. I will say to the gentleman that the county clerk of New York County up to within a few years ago received an appropriation or permission to use money appropriated by Congress whereby he could assist the Federal judges in preparing papers, and so forth; but this body in its wisdom has taken away this fund. It did not amount to very much. I think it was $15,000 or $20,000 a year. This was taken away from our county clerk in New York County, and therefore this great congestion in the Federal courts resulted.

Mr. CELLER. Would it not be much better if jurisdiction to confer citizenship upon aliens in New York County and Kings County were in the hands of the State as well as the Federal judges? In other words, there are 28 judges in New York County and 18 in Kings County, and in conjunction with the United States judges they could easily handle all these naturalization cases and there would not be this crowding or congestion that some complain of, particularly the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, where there may be as many as 200 or 250 naturalized in one day.

Mr. BOYLAN. In answer to the question of the gentleman from New York, I will say yes. I agree with the gentleman, just as I stated to my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CLARKE]. This could be done if Congress would authorize a fund to be used by the county clerks for clerk hire and for the preparing of papers, and so forth. This should be done. I never could understand why we withdrew this support from the county clerks, because they are perfectly willing to take on the work. We have judges in the Supreme Court of New York where the term commences at 10 o'clock in the morning ordinarily, and in these naturalization cases in the Bronx, where they are now sitting, they have appeared in court as early as 8 o'clock in the morning in order to take up these cases before the regular term commences. This shows that if the Congress would give an appropriation to the county clerks every one of our supreme court judges would be willing to give part of his time, outside of the regular court hours, to the naturalization of citizens and help the work of the Federal courts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, while we are on the subject of correcting statements I want to say that the chairman of the Committee on Immigration yesterday referred to a judge who is working hard and diligently to make good, loyal Americans as a judge who seems "to wear alien spectacles."

That statement is absolutely unfair and most unworthy of the chairman of the Committee on Immigration. It so happens that this judge's name happens to end with a vowel, and if any one is so narrow minded and so bigoted as to take that into consideration no attention should be paid to his statement.

Judge Salvatore Cotillo is a judge of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, the court of the highest and unlimited jurisdiction in our State. He has been interested in Americanization work in this country for many years. Judge Cotillo does not wear alien spectacles, and no one has worked harder to make loyal Americans out of aliens than has he. He is not of my political faith. He is a real Tammany Democrat, and I am an insurgent, progressive, Lincoln Republican. [Laughter and applause.]

So we have no politics in common. We have worked together in Americanization work. I know how hard Judge Cotillo has worked at it, and that he has put his whole heart into it, and I know that many times the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the Committee on Immigration, has conferred with Judge Cotillo, so I was very much surprised at the statement made by the gentleman from Washington.

Now, it was also stated that 10,000 were to be naturalized in New York. That does not mean that they are going to be rushed through the mill, but it means that the Federal Government, the Naturalization Bureau, are 10,000 behind in their work.

Now, some interest was aroused by my colleague from New York [Mr. CELLER] in giving questions that were asked immigrants. There are questions asked applicants for citizenship by examiners that not a Member of this House could answer. If there is one man here who can tell right off who the Governor of New York was at the time of Lincoln's second inauguration I would like to hear it. But that was a question asked one of the applicants. Another was given an advertisement in a newspaper in a test for reading. It was an advertisement of a New York trust company, and he read it, and then he was asked what a trust company is. There are some Members in this House who can not give a proper legal definition of a trust company.

There was one war veteran who has a right to be naturalized as a matter of course. He was refused because his language was defective. He held an honorable discharge and a wounded certificate. Another was refused citizenship because he had been fined for a traffic violation. Just imagine a chauffeur driving in congested New York City declined citizenship because he violated a traffic regulation. Even judges do that. As long as there is such prejudice and animus developed on the part of officials charged with the question of naturalization, surely the gentleman from Washington ought not to make such statements concerning an honest, conscientious judge. In one breath they take the floor and criticize the immigrants for not becoming citizens and in the next breath the chairman of the Committee on Immigration attempts to retard and prevent naturalization.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Is it not a fact that they are too far behind in their naturalization?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. And in that way they defeat naturalization.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think it is all unintentional.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. And the Immigration Service has fallen so far behind that it will take two or three years to catch up.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are 18 months behind. Now, I want to say that Judge Salvatore Cotillo came to this country when an infant. He represents and typifies the opportunities this good Republic affords to her loyal citizens. He is a good American and as loyal as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] or any Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in a way I am glad that this subject of naturalization in New York has come up for discussion during this debate. I am sorry that I was not able to be on the floor during all the past one-half hour to hear all that has been said. On the 5th day of this month, last Thursday, I made some remarks here in a running debate on immigration and incidentally called attention to the fact that a class of 10,000 was being naturalized in New York City. I stated that in good faith. Yesterday my friend Mr. BOYLAN called the attention of the House to the fact that I had made it appear that the entire class was to be called up for naturalization on that day.

He was anxious that that be corrected. Let us have the facts. I was led into my statement by the receipt on the morning of the 5th of January, the very day that I addressed this body, of the following letter from the justices' chambers of the supreme court, Salvatore A. Cotillo, justice:

SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
New York City, January 3, 1928.

DEAR SIR: Herewith inclosed please find copy of Judge Cotillo's address, which he will deliver on the morning of January 5 at the Bronx County courthouse, One hundred and sixty-first Street and Third Avenue, at the opening of court for the naturalization of 10,000 applicants.

You may be interested in commenting on the views there expressed, particularly as to the necessity of undivided allegiance of our new citizens to America, which is entirely consistent with the love of the culture and traditions of the country from which they sprang.

Yours respectfully,

FRANK H. COOPER, Secretary.

P. S.—Appreciating any comments you make.

Then follows the manuscript of the address, with this heading, which you can all see:

Address delivered by Justice S. A. Cotillo, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, at the Bronx County courthouse, New York City, on January 5, 10 o'clock a. m., at the opening of court to naturalize 10,000 applicants for citizenship, who have clogged the supreme court calendar in the Bronx.

Not only I would be justified in drawing the inference that the great body of prospective candidates for citizenship were assembled at that time, but that was also sent to the newspapers.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Assembled in one court room?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It might have been in the open air. At any rate, there is the way the publicity was proposed. It may be necessary to make a statement of that exaggerated kind to attract attention. I have made inquiry since. I was in telephonic communication this morning with Judge Cotillo. I find that it is intended to hold court daily for naturalization purposes and that the candidates are to be brought in in four groups per day, each group numbering from 100 to 125; that on Tuesday he naturalized 385, and on Monday 376, and so on, and that that practice would be kept up until the whole 10,000 are naturalized. I assume that this address was delivered on the 5th and that it was supposed to reach all of the 10,000 candidates who are to be naturalized.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BOYLAN. Probably the gentleman was not here when I was speaking, but I read a telegram from the county clerk of Bronx County giving the exact number that have been naturalized each day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then that must be in accord with these figures that I obtained over the telephone.

Mr. Chairman, this subject of naturalization is a hard one. It is pretty generally admitted by those who have studied the subject that the present naturalization laws hardly fit modern conditions, and only to-day I have had the pleasure of introducing a new naturalization bill which represents in part the work of the committee of this House for upwards of four years' time. It represents the work of some members of the committee during the fall and summer, and it represents the work of those who are conversant with naturalization in the Department of Labor as well as the work of certain members of the Senate committee. I would like to have you all get copies of that bill to-morrow and see whether it agrees with your views as to what a modern method of naturalization should be.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Whether one approves the hurried method adopted by judges in hearing naturalization matters or not, this is true, and, of course, the gentleman is familiar with the practice that there has been in advance a very careful examination made of the various applicants.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And a full and complete report made by the examiners to the judge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Quite so.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And it is on the report of the examiners that the judge bases his decision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Quite so; but even at that I know that many are being naturalized who should not be given citizenship.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I knew that the gentleman did not intend to convey the impression that a judge called before him a great number and naturalized a great number in one day, and had during that time undertaken to make special inquiry, but that he had referred that to other parties to make the inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, I would not even think that they had been scooped up out of the street and asked to hold up their hands and take the oath of allegiance without certain preliminaries.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In a moment. In the talk with Judge Cotillo over the telephone this morning he seemed to feel a little hurt that I had apparently reflected upon him, and I told him that before this procedure was over I would endeavor to visit New York and view a day of it in its actual working. He said to me that the speech which he delivered was addressed to 10,000 candidates whether they were physically present before him or not. I have also learned that the judge's address is causing him to be severely arraigned in some of the foreign-language newspapers. I do not doubt it one bit. I shall ask the Congressional Library to find those papers and to make translations for the information of the Immigration Committee. I shall take the time to read a portion of his address. It rings just as true as my friend the Representative from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has said it would, and it goes to the very crux of the situation we are getting to in the United States. After some preliminary remarks about citizenship, Judge Cotillo, in the address to 10,000 prospective citizens, said:

Above all you must be loyal to the laws and institutions of America. It is not sufficient that you refrain from violating the legal, social, and political obligations imposed upon you by the laws of the land. Mere conformity is not enough. You must prove your Americanism by an affirmative attachment to the ideals upon which this Republic is founded, and by a concrete contribution to the great task of perpetuating the common patrimony. In other words, you must be an American by your deeds as well as by your words.

There is too much lip patriotism in this country at this time. Too many people are compromising with the duties and responsibilities of their citizenship. There is too great a division of loyalty to the spirit and even the letter of our institutions. Never have we witnessed so flagrant a compromise of citizenship as we are witnessing now.

Men masking behind outer forms of loyalty are actually engaged in the propagation of political ideas that strike at the very roots of our democratic structure. Alien agitators in the service of foreign parties have become unusually active in our immigrant "colonies." These agitators are preaching the gospel of an alien allegiance which tends to undermine the whole of our Americanization movement.

They may be acting in good faith, and I sincerely hope that they are; but the obvious result of their agitation is clearly inimical to the best interests of our country.

Of late we have had some shameful examples of their willingness to make trouble. In this country, in the very shadow of this court, we have seen men murdered because of their attachment to alien causes, because of their interest in political struggles that are far removed from American soil.

This activity can not, and will not, be tolerated. There is no room in this country for men of half-way allegiance, and no good American will permit our soil to become a battle ground for alien causes.

I am not referring to any particular group or groups, but to all those who are now abusing the hospitality of America for reasons of their own. The political duty of every citizen in this country is to America and America only.

We can have no patience with those who pledge allegiance to the Republic and in their hearts remain loyal to other causes.

There is nothing more dangerous to the stability of our democratic institutions and the peace and welfare of our people than the pernicious agitation of the foreign propagandist.

There is nothing more detrimental to the welfare of the immigrant himself than the meddling, the dictation, and the misleading counsel of the propagandist, who, under the pretense of a superficial loyalty to America, is actually engaged in promoting and perpetuating an alien allegiance, an allegiance often typified by his own refusal to accept American citizenship.

All the ruthless, heartless, criminal exploitation of the immigrant in this country has been done in the name of an alien patriotism. The flags of Europe have been made to shield too many swindlers in this country, and I say it is time we stopped it.

If the present laws of this country are insufficient to deal with this pernicious activity, then it is the duty of Congress to enact laws which will define more fully who is an undesirable alien and provide more stringent methods for the revocation of American citizenship.

We can not stand by and allow a disloyal minority to poison the minds and the hearts of our people. The man who is out of sympathy with our laws and institutions, who can not share our common idealism, does not belong here. And the citizen who can not live up to the spirit and the letter of his citizenship should have his citizenship revoked.

There is just one ism for which we will stand, which we can tolerate and encourage in this country, and that is Americanism; all other isms, from any part of the world, are unwelcome.

The communist and the bolshevist may be a fit subject for Russia, but not for the United States. This applies equally to those fascisti or antifascisti who can not approve of the ways of democracy.

The American people can not tolerate dictatorships, be they of the left or of the right; even though these dictatorships may be necessary and beneficial elsewhere.

But while I am stressing the danger of alien agitation in this country I am not unmindful of the fact that there are equally dangerous forces at work who though inspired by a desire to protect America against this agitation actually endanger the very institution they seek to protect. I refer to those Americans who, under the banner of bigotry and intolerance are fostering divisions of race, creed, and color in this country. This activity is to be deeply regretted.

Another point I seek to make.

Many of you come from countries which have contributed in great measure to the civilization of the world. America is proud to have you. The sons and daughters of Ireland, Italy, Russia, Poland, Germany, France, and other countries of the Old World bring with them a heritage rich in spiritual and cultural achievements. We Americans are proud of the contribution of the immigrant, a contribution of labor, and thought reflecting the grandeur of Europe.

There is no doubt of the heroic contributions made by citizens of foreign extraction in the American Army during the late World War.

Regardless from what land they emanated, they were Americans, all fighting a common enemy for the liberty of mankind. Only a few days ago a German mother, living in Brooklyn, received as her New Year's greetings notifications from the War Department of her son's death in Nicaragua.

This illustrates conclusively that not only are immigrants who have sworn allegiance to America ready to accept the opportunities that are available to them, but they are ready to fight and die for the land of their adoption.

While it is expected that you shall pledge undivided allegiance to America, America does not expect you to forego your love for the land of your birth.

Be proud of the country you come from. Be sympathetic with the heroic efforts that your native lands are making in solving the many postwar problems that beset them, especially since the peace of the world depends on the solution of many of those problems.

We Americans feel that each country is entitled to the kind of government that best suits its needs, but we are opposed to the extension of the influence of any European government to these shores, for this extension tends to retard the progress of assimilation and handicap the immigrant himself in the betterment of his social and economic conditions.

Incidentally I might observe that in view of the conditions that prevail among certain foreign groups in this city, State, and country, it would be wise and opportune for certain European governments to delegate the control of their nationals abroad, in this country particularly, exclusively to their ambassadors and consuls, who are much more competent to understand the psychology of the country with which they are dealing than the many opportunists who exploit the patriotism of our alien groups for purposes of their own.

I will refuse citizenship to anyone who is not proud of the country of his birth. Anyone who does not love his own country is not apt to love the country of his adoption.

I know that you have prepared for this honor faithfully, and that deep in your hearts is the willingness to be of real service to our common country. I sincerely congratulate you.

* * * * * * *

This day should be memorable to you, since henceforth you are no longer a stranger in a strange land, but a member of the great American family, sharing in the duties and privileges of active participation in our democracy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman—although I shall not object—I have heard a good deal of this controversy pro and con from the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from New York. I can not quite understand what this is about. Is the gentleman criticizing the judge over there in a wholesale manner?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I am reading some remarks made by him to naturalized citizens. If these remarks had been made by Roosevelt and other farsighted men of a former time, they could not have better warned us of the dangers we are coming to through the so-called race loyalty of some of our adopted citizens.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will close up the incident at least.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I could have placed this into the RECORD yesterday through an extension granted to me, but I thought that under the circumstances that I had better make these statements verbally. I would not do the judge an injustice. Judge Cotillo was himself a member of the organization known as the Sons of Italy when they debated the question some time ago whether they should by vote and resolution give their allegiance to Italy or to the United States. The testimony before our committee showed that Judge Cotillo was himself a deciding factor in the solution of that matter when he voted and placed himself on the side of America.

We are trying in our committee very hard to follow suggestions made several years ago, and codify and bring into one code all the matters that should go into that code. One will be a naturalization bill and another will be a revised immigration bill. If we can make a complete revision we may be able to correct certain conditions that exist and which cause much complaint. We must do it all at once. We can not do it one part at a time. The subjects are too controversial to be handled by small and separate bills. The hearings on deportation show that the Assistant Secretary of Labor thinks that with the money available they will be able only to scratch the matter of deportations on the surface.

I shall ask for an increase of $500,000 in the lump sum for the enforcement of the immigration laws, and that a portion of that fund be allocated to the border patrol. I am convinced that prevention is most to be desired and is real economy in the long run. Soon our committee will be confronted with the great problem of placing restrictions on the immigration from the Latin-American Republics—21 Republics. Allied to that will be restrictions to the countries north of us.

This matter of deportation is not easy. Two sovereign countries must be parties to every deportation. Men whom you pick up to send out of the country are not always received by their home nation on the other side. This Government is helpless to compel a man to sign a passport.

I do not want to quarrel with any branch of this House or with any part of the membership of this House or any part of the people of the United States, but it has been my hope that we would eventually so legislate on this matter that we would eventually have a united United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman has been big enough and broad enough to admit that when he saw the light he would make the necessary correction. I hope the gentleman will also continue that spirit in regard to a retraction of the statement he made touching Governor Smith.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is asking entirely too much there. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Then the gentleman still persists in that attitude?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Support of prisoners: For support of United States prisoners, including necessary clothing and medical aid, discharge gratuities provided by law and transportation to place of conviction or place of bona fide residence in the United States, or such other place within the United States as may be authorized by the Attorney General; and including rent, repair, alteration, and maintenance of buildings occupied under authority of sections 5537 and 5538 of the Revised Statutes; support of prisoners becoming insane during imprisonment, and who continue insane after expiration of sentence, who have no friends to whom they can be sent; shipping remains of deceased prisoners to their friends or relatives in the United States, and interment of deceased prisoners whose remains are unclaimed; expenses incurred in identifying and pursuing escaped prisoners and for rewards for their recapture; and not exceeding $2,500 for repairs, betterments, and improvements of United States jails, including sidewalks, $2,350,000: Provided, That hereafter contracts for the subsistence and care of Federal prisoners, within the discretion of the Attorney General, may be made for a period not exceeding three years.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language contained in the proviso beginning on line 22 and ending at the end of line 25 of page 47, on the ground that it is legislation, unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and seeks to change existing law.

Mr. SHREVE. I am willing to admit that it is legislation, but it is very necessary legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not here to question the advisability of passing such legislation, but we have our legislative committees of the House, and if the Committee on Appropriations expects the bulk of its membership here to follow it in helping to uphold its bill, it must keep out of the field of legislation.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say that the department itself made the recommendation.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Instead of coming to the chairman of the legislative committee and saying, "Gentlemen, we want the law changed," they go to the Committee on Appropriations' subcommittee. We ought to stop it. We ought to do either one of two things; either abolish all the legislative committees or else hold this Committee on Appropriations in line. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AIRCRAFT IN COMMERCE

Aircraft in commerce: To carry out the provisions of the act approved May 20, 1926, entitled "An act to encourage and regulate the use of aircraft in commerce, and for other purposes," including personal services in the District of Columbia (not to exceed $153,760 for the fiscal year 1929) and elsewhere; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; traveling expenses; contract stenographic reporting services; fees and mileage of witnesses; purchase of furniture and equipment; stationery and supplies, including medical supplies, typewriting, adding, and computing machines, accessories, and repairs; maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; purchase of not to exceed five airplanes, including accessories and spare parts, and maintenance, operation, and repair of airplanes, including accessories and spare parts; special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes; purchase of books of reference and periodicals; newspapers, reports, documents, plans, specifications, maps, manuscripts, and all other publications; and all other necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $662,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the sum "$662,000" on page 52, line 10, for the purpose of getting some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 10, strike out the figures "$662,000."

Mr. BLANTON. What is the purpose of the committee, if I may ask the chairman, in extending and enlarging the air service of the Department of Commerce?

Mr. SHREVE. Well, the gentleman knows that the Department of Commerce has charge of the air.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the private air service of the Department of Commerce. This paragraph permits the department to purchase five new airplanes. For what purpose?

Mr. SHREVE. For the inspection of the aircraft in the country.

Mr. BLANTON. That is for the inspection of commercial airplanes?

Mr. SHREVE. All.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not mean that they shall inspect the airplanes in the Army and in the Navy and in the Marine Corps, but only with respect to airplanes in such other jurisdiction as comes within their scope?

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman from Alabama is nearer the gentleman from Texas and will give the gentleman the information.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not handle all the members of the committee at the same time.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am sure all the gentleman wants is information?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; definite information.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Supplementing what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, these planes are supplied in order that the department may better and more efficiently perform its duties under the law.

Mr. BLANTON. In my own time, may I ask my colleague from Alabama this question? I know what is in his mind, and this is not what is in my mind: There are those in this Government to-day, men of substance and of good judgment, who believe that there should be a unified air service of the Government; that it should embrace the Air Service of the Army, of the Navy, of the Marine Corps, and of the executive departments of the Government, including the great Department of Commerce, as well as every other air service, and there should be one head to it in order to prevent duplication and thus save money. What is the policy of this subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations with regard to that proposal on the part of men of good, sound judgment and common sense?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. So far as this subcommittee is concerned, they are clothed with no authority in that matter; they are seeking here to provide planes for a service authorized by law in order that that service may function more efficiently.

Mr. BLANTON. I am for everything the gentleman is for in that respect, but continually every year, Congress after Congress, the Navy is expanding its air service, the Army is expanding its air service, and the other air services are expanding separately and apart from each other. There is no continuity and there is no attempt whatever to prevent duplication.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am afraid that if this committee should undertake to write their own views on that subject the gentleman would object to it, as he would have a right to do, under a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but the committee has so framed its policies in enlarging the particular air service of our Mr. Secretary Hoover in the Department of Commerce that a point of order will not lie against it; they have so adroitly framed their bill as to bring it within the rules and thus preventing a point of order from reaching it.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am done, and I yield the floor. I have gotten this off my system, and I yield.

The Clerk read as follows:

For carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1927, to establish in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce a Foreign Commerce Service of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, the compensation of a clerk or clerks for each commercial attaché at the rate not to exceed $3,000 per annum for each person so employed, rent outside the District of Columbia, telephone service, purchase of furniture and equipment, stationery and supplies, typewriting, adding, duplicating, and computing machines, accessories and repairs, law books, books of reference and periodicals, maps, reports, documents, plans, specifications, manuscripts, newspapers (foreign and domestic) not exceeding $4,000, and all other publications, traveling expenses of officers and employees, ice and drinking water for office purposes, and all other incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, and under the following heads:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph for the purpose of asking a question. When we provided for these commercial attachés we did not provide a clerk for each one of them?

Mr. SHREVE. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. The committee now provides a clerk for each one of them. Under what authority of law?

Mr. SHREVE. There is no authority of law, and we are not providing a clerk for them.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is what the language says:

The compensation of a clerk or clerks for each commercial attaché at the rate not to exceed $3,000 per annum for each person so employed.

And so on. Now, that does provide as many as one clerk and maybe several clerks for each commercial attaché so long as they do not pay them more than $3,000 a year. That language says that emphatically.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHREVE. Of course, the gentleman knows it is just an administrative function. That is all. It comes within section 169 of the Revised Statutes, and is found in One hundred and eighty-sixth Barnes, Federal Code.

Mr. BLANTON. But that code applies to the executive departments of this Government.

Mr. SHREVE. It applies to all the departments of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. When those codes were passed it was never dreamed that each commercial attaché should have a clerk or a bevy of clerks.

Mr. SHREVE. That is up to the authorities in charge; they can regulate it.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think the organic law permits his committee to provide a clerk or a bevy of clerks for each commercial attaché?

Mr. SHREVE. The law I have just quoted provides for clerks wherever they are necessary in the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I shall not make a point of order against the paragraph because possibly there may be a clerk or a bevy of clerks needed, but I want to call the attention of the country to the fact that every single employee of the Government we now have is seeking to have at least one clerk, and maybe two clerks, to do his work for him so he can play golf or do something else that pleases him.

Mr. SHREVE. They have not been very successful.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the gentleman and his committee have not limited them to one, because the language provides for the compensation of a clerk or clerks.

Mr. SHREVE. Well, we are unable to legislate on appropriation bills.

Mr. BLANTON. I claim that is legislation, but I shall not make a point of order against it.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I want to call attention to the fact——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word simply to call the attention of the chairman and the gentleman from Texas to the fact that the act which created the Foreign Service, the act approved March 3, 1927, in section 4, does specifically authorize the appointment of clerks.

Mr. BLANTON. To each commercial attaché?

Mr. HOCH. I will read it to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Read it, and the gentleman will see it does not apply to them.

Mr. HOCH. I read from section 4:

Subject to the requirements of the civil service laws and rules, the Secretary is authorized to appoint, fix the compensation of, promote, demote, and separate from the service such clerks and other assistants for officers of the Foreign Commerce Service as he may deem necessary.

This is very broad language and plainly includes the authorization to appoint clerks.

Mr. BLANTON. That does not contemplate giving a clerk or a bevy of clerks to each commercial attaché? Three thousand dollars for each one of these clerks is more salary than most of the attachés have ever drawn either in the foreign commercial service or in our diplomatic foreign service.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. There has been a great deal of conversation between the consuls and the commercial attachés as to why a consul is only allowed to pay $1,000 for a foreign secretary while a commercial attaché is allowed to pay any amount he desires. Has that been corrected in this bill

Mr. SHREVE. We are not able to correct that for the reason it would be legislation, and we are not permitted to legislate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WATSON. It is a matter that ought to be corrected, because it is impossible to get a clerk for $1,000 a year, although he may be a native one.

Mr. SHREVE. We recognize the fact it should be corrected and we hope the legislative committee will consider the matter. The gentleman is quite right about it.

Mr. WATSON. It is impossible to get a clerk for this amount who is responsible for the work such a clerk has to do, and the situation ought to be remedied.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman is quite right, and we would be pleased to remedy it, but we have not the authority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Promoting commerce in Latin America: Investigations in Latin America for the promotion and development of the foreign commerce of the United States, $458,817, of which amount not to exceed $113,800 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I want at this time to say a word of appreciation of the work of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] and the members of his committee in the development of our domestic and foreign trade. Some years ago Mr. SHREVE had the foresight to see of what enormous value trade development would prove to be. I am thankful—and I know the business people are thankful—for this work. They write to me constantly of their approval of it. During the war our industries expanded and at the present time we must have something to take up the slack between supply and demand. One of the Nation's greatest needs is to develop our markets. It avails us but little if we make fine products if we can not sell them. Other countries are developing their foreign trade, and it is absolutely essential that we should wake up and have our fair share of foreign trade.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] has done a very wonderful work in this direction, as has the Department of Commerce. I want to speak of my experience with Secretary Hoover's Department of Commerce. My requests for information are granted at the earliest possible moment. No one acts as if any task were a burden. No one has ever mentioned a question of salary. No one has ever made a personal request or asked a favor of any kind. I feel perfectly sure that every person in that department I have ever talked to would gladly work all night in securing information. Everyone is eager to serve. It is the department of intelligent constructive service.

I have used this department, I think, perhaps more than any department in Washington, as my district is commercial, being half industrial and half agricultural. We have some "sick" industries in my district. Our cotton-manufacturing plants have had a difficult time. It is not a question alone of oversupply in our New England industries. We are not in fair competition with the South in hours of labor, in wages, in taxation, and raw materials. This will be remedied in time.

We must help New England and the entire country in developing trade. Our flag of commerce ought to fly in every country. Foreigners should see more and more the "Made in the United States" mark. There are great opportunities for American trade development in the Near and Far East, and in Australia. There are great possibilities for developing our trade in Mexico, in Central America, and in South America. Ever since 1914 people from those countries have said, "Why does not America develop her trade in our country?" In aviation alone we are far behind other nations, in the sale of airplanes, and in air lines. Everyone understands the value of quick mail in commerce. It is humiliating that the pioneer aeronautical move in Latin America was started by the Curtiss Co. in 1914; but since then foreign countries hove left us so far behind that we are not real competitors. I have been told that the advantage of this rapid system of communication between the commercial centers of western Europe and the east coast of South America can not be overemphasized. The transmission of orders, remittances, quotations, specifications, and other business correspondence will give our European competitors a tremendous advantage in this trade arrangement. The factor of interest savings and the multiplication of activities of capital employed in this trade alone will place our exporters at a handicap compared to European firms.

Our experience with the transcontinental air mail shows very clearly the advantages which they will have and brings very definitely to our attention the need for similar services between the United States and Latin-American countries. Our trade with Latin America in 1926 amounted to almost $2,000,000,000, of which over $872,000,000 consists of exports from the United States to those countries. One of the primary advantages in our trade with Latin America has been our comparative proximity to these countries as is shown by the fact that the percentage of the import trade of these countries held by the United States shows a striking decrease as the distance from our trade centers increases. As an example of the effect of distance on our foreign trade with these countries, it is interesting to know that the farther South one goes the smaller is the share of the imports received from the United States; Mexico receiving 70 per cent of her imports from this country, Central America 62 per cent, Colombia 49 per cent, Peru 39 per cent, and Chile 28 per cent. Nothing could illustrate more clearly the advantages of rapid communication facilities than the above figures, and unless we can develop air mail services, at least on an equal basis with our European competitors, the advantage of our physical proximity to these countries will decrease.

I requested further assistance for the following industries: Textile, boot and shoe, hide and leather, machinery, paper, chemical, and aviation. I am sorry, of course, that the committee did not give us a little more money. I am sorry it did not give an authorization for more specialized trade commissioners for special commodities, but it is my impression, Mr. Chairman, that you are perfectly willing if a sick industry needs special help to have such help granted, and I hope that the committee will grant larger appropriations for this service next year.

I do not want to take up any more time of the committee in discussing this matter, but I want to thank the members of Mr. SHREVE's committee for their courteous consideration of my requests made last year and this year for foreign commissioners and the promotion of our domestic trade.

I happen to know of definite orders that have been brought about by the commercial attachés and trade commissioners of the Department of Commerce. I know of three consecutive orders that were given to the same mill in the State of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. Northern and southern capital received the benefit of the orders and southern labor received the benefit of the work and the wages. This is very definite proof, although only one, and there are hundreds of others of what this trade promotion work by the Department of Commerce has accomplished.

I thank you. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

District and cooperative office service: For all expenses necessary to operate and maintain district and cooperative offices, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, traveling and subsistence expenses of officers and employees, purchase of furniture and equipment, stationery and supplies, typewriting, adding, and computing machines, accessories and repairs, purchase of maps, books of reference and periodicals, reports, documents, plans, specifications, manuscripts, not exceeding $800 for newspapers, both foreign and domestic, for which payment may be made in advance, and all other publications necessary for the promotion of the commercial interests of the United States, and all other incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, $495,000, of which amount not to exceed $21,500 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce may require as a condition for the opening of a new office or the continuation of an existing office that commercial organizations in the district affected provide suitable quarters without cost to the Government or at rentals at lower than prevailing rates. The Secretary may, at his discretion, refuse to open a new office or continue an existing office where such assistance from local commercial organizations is not provided.

Mr. KADING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the heading of Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, line 12, on page 55, by striking out the figures where the same appears in said line "$495,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$510,000," and by adding the words immediately after such sum of "$510,000," the following words: "and that of such sum of $510,000, $15,000 shall be appropriated for a district office at Milwaukee, Wis."

Mr. KADING. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say in support of this amendment that the committee on page 23 of its report in connection with this bill says that out of the amount of $495,000 provided by this bill at this point $435,000 is the current appropriation for 23 existing district offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce; that the difference between that sum and $495,000, provided by the bill in the sum of $60,000, is for three additional offices—$15,000 for each of such three additional offices and $15,000 for additional employees at already existing offices. I understand that of these three additional offices contemplated Milwaukee is not included. I believe that Milwaukee should have a district office in connection with the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and I urge the passage of this amendment in the interest of the shippers interested and for the convenience of such shippers in Milwaukee, Watertown, and Wisconsin in general. I sincerely hope that the committee will support the amendment in view of the fact that the additional appropriation is nominal, advisable, and necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAWLEY). The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Domestic commerce and raw-materials investigations: For all expenses, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference and periodicals, furniture and equipment, stationery and supplies, typewriting, adding, and computing machines, accessories and repairs, medical supplies and first-aid outfits, reports, documents, plans, specifications, manuscripts, maps, and all other publications, rent outside of the District of Columbia, traveling and subsistence expenses of officers and employees, and all other incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, to enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to collect and compile information regarding the disposition and handling of raw materials and manufactures within the United States; and to investigate the conditions of production and marketing of foreign raw materials essential for American industries, $275,000, of which amount not to exceed $121,520 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so in order to ask the chairman of the committee in regard to this item and the previous one. I believe these items have been increased from the appropriations of last year by some $60,000.

Mr. SHREVE. Sixty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can the chairman give us any idea as to the manner in which this additional appropriation will probably be expended?

Mr. SHREVE. That is left to the department itself.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have read the testimony before the gentleman's committee in reference to this increased appropriation, and it seemed to me from the testimony of the department's representative that about half the increase was to be devoted to commodity experts in two lines of industry—I think the automobile and the textile industries.

Mr. SHREVE. We never name them in the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can not the representative of the department state where they expect to use it?

Mr. SHREVE. The committee never follows a recommendation of that sort. They might report what has been accomplished.

Mr. TREADWAY. The reason I bring this up is that one of the chief industries in my district is the paper manufacture, and I know the paper industry has been very much interested in having this line of work carried out for the paper industry itself. I should be only too glad to favor an additional amount in the hope and anticipation that some might be used for the manufacture of paper.

Mr. SHREVE. It is the understanding that a part of the appropriation will be used for experts to be employed during 1929 in paper commodities.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I understand that the department has indicated that in all likelihood it will include paper commodities?

Mr. SHREVE. That is the contemplation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I want to take a minute on this proposition in this paragraph and the following one:

To enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to collect and compile information regarding the disposition and handling of raw material and manufacture within the United States; and to investigate the conditions of production and marketing of raw materials essential for American industries, $275,000.

Now, in that connection I want you to turn to page 76 to the amount that is allowed the Bureau of Standards for the investigation and utilization of waste products from land—a farmer's product.

There it allows $50,000—of which amount not to exceed $41,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

That would leave $9,000 for field investigation.

Mr. SHREVE rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, just one moment. I want to show what the Bureau of Standards is doing with its little $50,000, of which only $9,000 is for field operation. Here is a letter dated December 12, 1927, from the Bureau of Standards addressed to myself, signed by George K. Burgess, director.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF STANDARDS,
Washington, December 12, 1927.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Utilization of waste-land products.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: 1. Remembering your interest in our investigation of waste-land products and believing that you will be particularly interested in the investigation of products from the cotton plant, I am inclosing herewith a brief statement of the work which we have done this fiscal year on the development of valuable products from the plant.

2. This work is a part of our investigation into the utilization of waste-land products for which $50,000 was made available during this fiscal year.

Respectfully,

GEORGE K. BURGESS, Director.

In that connection I ask unanimous consent that the statement from Director Burgess there referred to be incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

WORK ON BY-PRODUCTS FROM THE COTTON PLANT CONDUCTED UNDER THE ALLOTMENT FOR INVESTIGATING "WASTE-LAND PRODUCTS," JULY 1, 1927, TO DECEMBER 1, 1927

A preliminary investigation, including a trip to Memphis, Tenn., College Station, and Abilene, Tex., indicated (1) that the cotton stalk was being used in a small way for the manufacture of partition tile, but that the fertilizing value of the stalk is so high as to make its use for any other purpose of doubtful economy; (2) that the market for cottonseed hulls and bran is extremely fluctuating, so that a new outlet to steady the demand would be very helpful; (3) that the new process of harvesting the cotton crop by means of sledding has resulted in the collection of burrs in large quantities at the gins, and that a use for these burrs should be found.

In investigating what products can be made from such materials, the first logical move is to analyze them.

In preparing the hulls for analysis, it was discovered that if the hulls are ground and put through an air separator, the adhering linters can be cleanly removed, leaving the bran. Since there is usually a better market for the linter and the bran than there is for the hulls, and the extra manufacturing cost is low, this appears to be a logical thing to do. It has since been learned that one company has such a plant in operation.

Our analytical work gave the following results:

Per cent on dry basis

	Bran	Burrs
		Coarse	Fine
Ash	2.38	4.49	7.94
Crude fat	.91	.75	1.16
Crude protein	3.28	5.88	8.85
Crude fiber	37.04	50.68	38.33
Nitrogen-free extract	56.39	38.20	43.72

A further analysis of the ash from the burrs gave the following results:

	Per cent
Silica	15.95
Oxides of iron and aluminum	4.82
Lime	9.93
Magnesia	5.76
Sulphuric acid anhydride	3.79
Potash	33.20
Soda	11.09
Chlorine	2.11
Phosphorus pentoxide	4.10

This analysis shows the ash to be a very valuable fertilizer. It seems that an attempt has been made to persuade the farmers to haul these burrs back to the fields, but they are disinclined to do so because of the bulk of the product. If these burrs could be incinerated at the gins and the ash returned to the farmers, it would have quite an effect on the conservation of our supplies of potash. The manufacturing process is so simple that the price to the farmer should be much less than the present cost per unit of potash.

The term "crude fiber" means merely the result obtained when the sample is treated by empirical laboratory methods, and bears little relation to the cellulose actually present. The amounts of cellulose in these materials were found to be as follows:

	Bran	Burrs
		Coarse	Fine
	Per cent
Alpha cellulose	45.5	----------	----------
Beta and gamma cellulose	12.5	----------	----------
Total cellulose	58.0	57	43

It is to be noted that all of the three kinds of cellulose can be used for most purposes but that only the alpha variety is suitable for the manufacture of rayon.

Incidentally we have studied the analytical method for the estimation of cellulose, so that one determination now requires only two days, whereas formerly it took eight days.

Attention is particularly called to the difference of 14 per cent in the cellulose content of the fine and coarse burrs. It seems that the burr is an extremely heterogenous material. If we can find some method for concentrating the cellulose in a manner analogous to the way in which ores are concentrated, a material may be produced having a sufficiently high proportion of cellulose to compete economically with wood.

The "nitrogen-free extract" is a conglomerate made up of cellulose, lignin, and certain compounds of sugars. It has been found that the extract from cottonseed bran contains no sucrose or dextrose, but that hydrolysis produces 43.59 per cent of xylose, with traces of galactose and arabinose. This yield of xylose is very high as compared with the 12 to 15 per cent which is obtained from corncobs, for example. While there is no market for xylose at present it seems that a market may be developed for the acid made from it, as a food product, if it can be made cheaply. We are now investigating the method of hydrolysis to find out how to get maximum yields.

Furfural can be produced by the proper chemical treatment of any of these materials. We have obtained 26.17 per cent of furfural from cottonseed bran as compared with the 10 to 15 per cent yields now obtained commercially from oat hulls. Last year furfural had a limited market at 14 cents a pound. This year, at 10 cents a pound, the market has about doubled. Every cent which can be cut off the price will increase the demand. The greater yield obtainable from cottonseed hulls should reduce the price considerably. Furfural is used mainly in the manufacture of synthetic resins and plastics.

BUREAU OF STANDARDS, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I have another letter, dated January 6, 1928, from the Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce upon the same subject, signed by George K. Burgess, director, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF STANDARDS,
Washington, January 6, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Utilization of peanut hulls.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Under date of December 12 we sent to you a summary of the work which has been done on cotton burrs and cotton-seed hulls in connection with our waste-land products investigation. We are inclosing herewith similar information regarding the work which has been done on the utilization of peanut hulls.

Respectfully,

GEORGE K. BURGESS, Director.

I ask unanimous consent in that connection to insert in my remarks the statement from Director Burgess referred to therein.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

UTILIZATION OF PEANUT HULLS

In the attempts to find methods to utilize peanut hulls with greater economic returns to the farmer and the associated peanut-oil plants we have confined ourselves more especially to practical researches with the hope of discovering and developing promising processes quickly. We have therefore taken up three lines of work, with the following results:

I. We are attempting to find direct physical uses for the peanut hulls without any chemical treatments.

(1) We have been able to steam and soften mill-run peanut hulls and compress them at 1,500 pounds pressure per square inch into a hard, tough wall board of pleasing color. This wall board has not been changed or rotted or mildewed by four months' exposure to the air. Disinfectants and binders can be incorporated in the board when desired. The hulls left after extracting sugars therefrom under II below can be pressed into wall board while still hot and wet. Wall board has a large market and this process should be cheap.

(2) Work is under way to employ the fine-ground as well as coarse hulls as binders in gypsum acoustical wall board and building blocks. An expensive type of specially treated wood shavings is used at present. Such fiber-gypsum compositions are light in weight and do not readily fracture and crumble.

II. Another project is—

(1) The extraction and use of sugars, including xylose, from peanut hulls by means of acids or water; and

(2) The employment of the extracted hulls for making a gypsum binder, wall board, or pulp for rayon (artificial silk).

(a) The extraction of sugars from peanut hulls has not been successfully developed and yields of 35 to 40 per cent are obtained. The process has now passed the experimental stage and is being employed with 6 pounds per charge. The chief constituent of these sugars is the heretofore rare and high-priced sugar, xylose. We believe that xylose can be manufactured cheaply and sold in large quantities. The following practical studies have been made to that end—

(b) We have crystallized xylose from water alone without the use of expensive solvents and are now studying practical methods for doing this commercially.

(c) We have oxidized this xylose by means of chlorine and nitric acid into an organic acid called xylo trioxglutoric acid, or xylo acid as an abbreviation. This xylo acid is very similar to tartaric, citric, and malic acids, for which there are already large markets. We are now concentrating on practical methods for making and using this xylo acid.

(d) We have shown that the xylose can be fermented by certain molds and fungi and are studying the products.

(e) We are studying the use of xylose in slowing up the setting of gypsum to replace other retarders now in wide use.

III. The hulls remaining after extraction of sugars in II are useful for making wall board or gypsum binders, as recited above. But these hulls contain a large percentage of cellulose after removal of the sugars. We have used a soda cook and bleaching methods on these extracted hulls and produced a good grade of pulp therefrom. We are making an intensive study of methods of making this pulp in the belief that it will find a large commercial outlet in the manufacture of rayon.

BUREAU OF STANDARDS, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1928.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, why is not the subcommittee as willing to grant the Bureau of Standards on behalf of the agricultural interests of America the sum of $275,000 that it granted to industry for the investigation of raw materials? Is not that a fair question? Is not the gentleman's subcommittee and the Congress as willing to help find a use for the present waste products of the farms and ranches and investigate its raw materials as it is to do these things for industry? If it is willing to give $275,000 to industry to investigate raw materials in behalf of industry, why is it not just as willing to give a like sum of $275,000 to the Bureau of Standards to investigate the utilization of waste farm products which now mean so much to the farmers of the country? I am going to offer an amendment when we get to this page under the Bureau of Standards to ask not $275,000 but to add to this little $9,000 they can spend now in the field during the next fiscal year under this bill the sum of $100,000, less than half of what you are giving to industry on the same subject. Is the gentleman going to oppose that?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Why?

Mr. SHREVE. For the reason that the Bureau of Standards is working on the scientific subject of the production of various commodities.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is doing wonderful work, and it will do it for the producers of the country if it is given the money.

Mr. SHREVE. I fully agree with the gentleman regarding the work, and they already have enough money.

Mr. BLANTON. And when it gets to doing something that is worth while for the farmer——

Mr. SHREVE. Then you will find the Bureau of Standards on the job.

Mr. BLANTON. We can not get the steering committee in line. It will approve a bill like the McNary-Haugen bill that will create a big corporation to ship the farmer's products abroad, and if there is any profit on those products it will be distributed not among the farmers who raise the products but given to the corporation—a bill that your President was forced to veto; a bill that he can not stomach, that he has had to turn down; but when it comes to a proposition of helping the farmers, the producers, the dirt farmers of this country, the steering committee turns it down. They are not in favor of it. But we are going to give you a chance to vote upon it.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; if the gentleman has any defense, I would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. SHREVE. The item that is now before the committee is a different one from what the gentleman has mentioned, to be found on page 76 of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it just antedates what is to come a little later.

Mr. SHREVE. May I say a half dozen words?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman in my time.

Mr. SHREVE. After the Bureau of Standards has found a method for producing the matter the gentleman has been talking about and converting it to some useful purpose, then we would have to find a market, and you have got to go to the markets of the world to dispose of it. If it were not for this section, you would find a whole lot of products lying on the farms and about factories that could not be consumed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have ever seen the gentleman from Pennsylvania place the cart before the horse. First, according to his own argument, he wants to find a market for a product that does not now exist, because these waste products are not now marketable, and will become marketable only when the Bureau of Standards finds some use for them. Therefore he wants to find a market before the bureau finds that they have valuable uses. I hope the gentleman will be generous and will let us enlarge this amount in behalf of the farmers of the country.

The Clerk read as follows:

Collecting statistics: For securing information for census reports, provided for by law, semimonthly reports of cotton production, periodical reports of stocks of baled cotton in the United States and of the domestic and foreign consumption of cotton; quarterly reports of tobacco; per diem compensation of special agents and expenses of same and of detailed employees, whether employed in Washington, D. C., or elsewhere; the cost of transcribing State, municipal, and other records; temporary rental of quarters outside of the District of Columbia; for supervising special agents, and employment by them of such temporary service as may be necessary in collecting the statistics required by law, including $15,000 for collecting tobacco statistics authorized by law in addition to any other fund available therefor, and including not to exceed $5,000 for the employment by contract of personal services for the preparation of monographs on census subjects: Provided, That the compensation of not to exceed 10 special agents provided for in this paragraph may be fixed at a rate not to exceed $8 per day, $875,000, of which amount not to exceed $350,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia, including temporary employees who may be appointed under the civil-service rules at per diem rates to be fixed by the Director of the Census without regard to the provisions of the classification act, for the purpose of assisting in periodical inquiries: Provided, That temporary employees of the Bureau of the Census may be allowed leave of absence with pay at the rate of two and one-half days a month.

Mr. BLACK of Texas rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order on the proviso.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I wanted to reserve a point of order on the language on page 62, line 4—without regard to the provisions of the classification act.

I would like to find out any reason why the classification act should be set aside in this particular case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve a point of order, too.

Mr. SHREVE. It is current law. It is current every 10 years. We are about to have a new census. There must be certain preliminaries that must be gone through. We must secure the force and men must be trained, and we must bring in men qualified to train those men. It is current law every 10 years.

I admit that the language is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I have no desire to make a point of order if the committee has looked into it and found that there is a good reason to make an exception in this case.

Mr. SHREVE. We have looked into it. Under this law the census would be seriously handicapped. We could not find the proper men among those who now come within the classification act.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. In view of the statement made by the chairman of the subcommittee, I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order on the following language, beginning on line 3 of page 62, reading as follows:

Without regard to the provisions of the classification act, for the purpose of assisting in periodical inquiries: Provided, That temporary employees of the Bureau of the Census may be allowed leave of absence with pay at the rate of two and one-half days a month.

That is legislation unauthorized upon an appropriation bill, and it seeks to change existing law; and it should come out of the bill.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman wants to be fair about it.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. There are a number of departments here in the Government which employ temporary employees. Now, regarding all the permanent employees, those employees get their leave; but when they employ a person, say, for 15 days, then under this provision they must give them a day and a quarter leave. If they employ them for a month, you will give them two and a half days leave. It is ridiculous. Until you extend this provision to every one of the departments and bureaus and Government establishments you ought not to pass it as to one. You ought not to make fish of one and fowl of another. You ought to treat them all alike.

Mr. SHREVE. This only occurs once in 10 years.

Mr. BLANTON. No; departments are employing temporary employees now. The gentleman does not get in as close touch as I do with them.

Mr. SHREVE. We take the census of the United States every 10 years, and in order to do that some necessary things must be taken care of, and this is one, in order to provide a force. These men could not be found in the classified service, men trained with the necessary equipment.

Mr. BLANTON. The men who will be appointed from my district would not want any two and a half days' leave each month in addition to their holidays and Sundays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In order to properly employ the people from the gentleman's district an enormous amount of preliminary work must necessarily be done. This is an enormous work.

Mr. BLANTON. Eventually we are going to get into a position where we will be granting leave and retirement so generally that you will have more than one-half of the people on the pay roll doing nothing, supported by the other less than half. As to these temporary employees, they ought not to have any leave at all, considering the number of days they have off under the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Government has grown enormously, and these temporary clerks are necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Washington that soon he will find the Committee on Appropriations bringing in immigration bills and naturalization bills, and the gentleman will have nothing in the world to do except to sit here and say yea and nay.

Mr. SHREVE. That will not happen under the present administration.

Mr. BLANTON. The administration will be changed, and the cycle has probably been reached now when soon there will be a change.

Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order. It is clearly legislation, unauthorized on this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of navigation laws: To enable the Secretary of Commerce to provide and operate such motor boats and employ thereon such persons as may be necessary for the enforcement, under his direction, of laws relating to navigation and inspection of vessels, boarding of vessels, and counting of passengers on excursion boats, including insignia, braid, and chin straps, and coats, caps, and aprons, for stewards' departments on vessels, $89,000.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NEWTON. I note on page 65, lines 1 to 8, the provision for the enforcement of navigation laws. The appropriation goes into such minute detail as to specify that the money can be used for "insignia, braid, and chin straps," and so forth.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Now, just what is the occasion for going into this minute detail?

Mr. SHREVE. It becomes necessary by reason of the ruling of the Comptroller General.

Mr. NEWTON. I merely want to make the observation that in the creation of the position of Comptroller General and in the administration of the work of that office sometimes those who are at work upon it carry their work out in such a minute and critical way that language of this kind seems to be necessary in an appropriation bill. It would seem to me that with the great work of that office there ought to be somebody in the institution with sufficient breadth of vision so that it would not be necessary to provide minutely in an appropriation bill for "chin straps" for a navigation officer.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Utilization of waste products from the land: For the survey of the possibilities of the industrial utilization of waste products from the land, including cooperation with colleges, other institutions and manufacturers, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $50,000, of which amount not to exceed $41,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 76, line 8, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$150,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 76, line 8, strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$150,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is the only paragraph in this bill which could benefit the farmer. You are giving the Bureau of Standards $50,000 with which to investigate the utilization of waste farm products and requiring them to spend $41,000 in the District of Columbia, leaving them only $9,000 to operate on in the field. I know my amendment has no chance to pass in the House. I have been operating on this bill by points of order, so I am afraid I have made myself persona non grata to the subcommittee and they are not going to let my amendment pass here. But what I shall say and have said and the reports I have placed in this RECORD from Director Burgess, of the Bureau of Standards, are probably going to cause the Senate to put this amendment in. The Senate will get the credit for it. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], if he were wise, could get the credit for it. The Republican steering committee on this floor, if it were wise, could get the credit for it. The Republican Party, if it were wise, could get the credit for it, but the organization is not going to let this amendment pass now. They will approve it in conference, when it comes from the Senate.

There is not anything that you could do which would be more beneficial or of greater value to the farmers than to grant this paltry $100,000 to the Bureau of Standards. Our Agricultural Department has never done anything in this field. We have given it thousands of dollars year after year to find uses for the waste products of the farm but it has never done a thing worth mentioning. The Bureau of Standards has been in this field one year. That is all. We have never given it an appropriation until this present fiscal year and then only this little, paltry $50,000. However, it has made a wonderful success already. Whenever it finds a valuable use for cotton stalks, burs, corn stalks, for oat and wheat straw, which it is going to do, in making commercial products of value, and making these waste products of great value, inure to the benefit of our producers, it is going to mean everything to the farmers of the country.

I can remember when our cattlemen used to sell their cattle, when their waste products were not used, at a very low figure. I have seen cows and calves, good big calves, sold for $10 apiece; that is, a cow and a calf. One of my good friends in Texas this year sold his yearlings for $55 and before they went off of his ranch and were delivered the man to whom he sold them sold them for $60. Do you know why? Every single thing about that beef is utilized by the packers. There is no waste material. They have found a use for everything about it, and when you find a use for all of the present waste farm products you are going to do a splendid service for the producers of this country.

I have made the record, and it is up to the gentleman as to what he wants to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, of course, I must oppose the amendment. I think I should say for the information of the committee that there is half a million dollars being carried in the Department of Agriculture for this same purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. And it has never done a thing.

Mr. SHREVE. The work of the Bureau of Standards is highly scientific and we are taking care of that work as fast as possible. The Bureau of the Budget did not make any suggestion of a higher appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. Because it is not interested very much in farming. General Lord is interested in many things, but not in farming.

Mr. SHREVE. Director Burgess has said he is doing a highly technical and scientific work and has money enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations herein made for the Bureau of Standards shall be available for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with standardization and research, or either, when incurred on the written authority of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, last year I appeared before the subcommittee and urged an appropriation sufficient to permit the establishment of a branch office of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in Florida.

This branch office was opened at Jacksonville, Fla., and has done and is doing a wonderful work. They have secured much valuable information and I have found them very efficient and we want to thank the committee and the Senate. The impression got out in some way that there were only a few district offices compelled to pay rent. I confess I fell into the error myself. In justice to the committee and in order that the people of Florida may understand the real facts, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are 23 branch offices in the United States, as follows:

Branch offices of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the United States

City	Building or location	Amount of rental paid per annum
Atlanta	Federal building	None.
Boston	Customhouse	None.
Chicago	76 West Monroe	$3,600
Des Moines	Federal building	None.
Detroit	Free Press Building	2,500
Galveston	Cotton Exchange Building	None.
Houston	Chamber of Commerce Building	None.
Jacksonville	Greenleaf-Crosby Building	None.
Kansas City	Chamber of commerce	None.
Los Angeles	Chamber of Commerce Building	None.
Louisville	Board of Trade Building	None.
Memphis	Chamber of Commerce Building	None.
Minneapolis	Federal building	None.
Mobile	Meaher Building	None.
New Orleans	Post-office building	None.
New York	Customhouse	None.
Norfolk	406 East Plume Street	None.
Philadelphia	20 South Fifteenth Street	$2,700
Portland	New post-office building	None.
St. Louis	Liberty Central Trust Co. Building	3,180
San Francisco	Customhouse	None.
Seattle	Skinner Building	2,800
Wilmington	Chamber of commerce	None.

Total amount of rent paid, $14,780.

In the case of 18 of these offices the Government pays no rent because most of them are located in chamber of commerce buildings, Federal buildings, or in buildings provided by the citizens, as is the case at Jacksonville, Fla., where they rent from Greenleaf & Crosby. There are only five district offices for which the Government pays any rent, the maximum rent being $3,600 a year for the branch office at Chicago.

I am not complaining because we pay rent for these five offices, but if rent is going to be paid for five, perhaps rent should be paid for all. I understand these offices were secured many, many years ago under the old law, and that is why the rent is being paid in this way. In view of the fact that 18 of the largest cities of the country, including Jacksonville, furnish the offices free, I could not ask my colleagues to put in this bill an appropriation for rent for a building where this wonderful work is being done in Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses: For supplies, including replacement of and necessary additions to existing equipment, repairs, maintenance, and incidental expenses of lighthouses and other lights, beacons, buoyage, fog signals, lighting of rivers heretofore authorized to be lighted, light vessels, other aids to navigation, and lighthouse tenders, including the establishment, repair, and improvement of beacons and day marks, and purchase of land for same; establishment of post lights, buoys, submarine signals, and fog signals; establishment of oil or carbide houses, not to exceed $10,000: Provided, That any oil or carbide house erected hereunder shall not exceed $1,000 in cost; construction of necessary outbuildings at a cost not exceeding $1,000 at any one light station in any fiscal year; improvement of grounds and buildings connected with light stations and depots; restoring light stations and depots and buildings connected therewith: Provided further, That such restoration shall be limited to the original purpose of the structures; wages of persons attending post lights; temporary employees and field force while engaged on works of general repair and maintenance, and laborers and mechanics at lighthouse depots; rations and provisions or commutation thereof for working parties in the field, officers and crews of light vessels and tenders, and officials and other authorized persons of the Lighthouse Service on duty on board of such tenders or vessels, and money accruing from commutation for rations and provisions for the above-named persons on board of tenders and light vessels or in working parties in the field may be paid on proper vouchers to the person having charge of the mess of such vessel or party; not exceeding $2,000 for packing, crating, and transporting personal household effects of employees when transferred from one official station to another for permanent duty; purchase of rubber boots, oilskins, rubber gloves, and coats, caps, and aprons for stewards' departments on vessels; reimbursement under rules prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce of keepers of light stations and masters of light vessels and of lighthouse tenders for rations and provisions and clothing furnished shipwrecked persons who may be temporarily provided for by them, not exceeding in all $5,000 in any fiscal year; fuel, light, and rent of quarters where necessary for keepers of lighthouses; purchase of land sites for fog signals; rent of necessary ground for all such lights and beacons as are for temporary use or to mark changeable channels and which in consequence can not be made permanent; rent of offices, depots, and wharves; traveling expenses, including travel for the examinations authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for retirement for disability in the Lighthouse Service," approved March 4, 1925; mileage; library books for light stations and vessels, and technical books and periodicals not exceeding $1,000; traveling and subsistence expenses of teachers while actually employed by States or private persons to instruct the children of keepers of lighthouses; all other contingent expenses of district offices and depots, including the purchase of provisions for sale to lighthouse keepers at isolated stations, and the appropriation reimbursed, and not exceeding $8,500 for contingent expenses of the office of the Bureau of Lighthouses in the District of Columbia, $4,275,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I want to ask the chairman in charge of the bill where is the authorization of law for the second proviso on page 79, beginning at line 5?

Mr. SHREVE. This is under the organic act—the general provisions of the law creating this bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not this new matter that the committee has placed in the bill?

Mr. SHREVE. It is not new matter. It is current law and has been carried for more than 10 years. It simply covers the general contingent expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. But it has been enlarged. It is not the same language, is it?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; I do not think there is a word changed.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not my notes before me, but I was under the impression this was new language.

Mr. SHREVE. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] I will withdraw the reservation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Propagation of food fishes: For maintenance, repair, alteration, improvement, equipment, and operation of fish-cultural stations, including not to exceed $4,000 to be made immediately available for the construction of trout nursery ponds at Mammoth Springs in Yellowstone National Park, general propagation of food fishes and their distribution, including movement, maintenance, and repairs of cars, purchase of equipment (including rubber boots and oilskins) and apparatus, contingent expenses, temporary labor, and not to exceed $10,000 for propagation and distribution of fresh-water mussels and the necessary expenses connected therewith, $503,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

It so happens, Mr. Chairman, that one of the fish-cultural stations is located in the district I have the honor to represent, and during the past year I have had occasion to deal with the bureau here quite extensively.

I simply rise at this time to express my appreciation of the manner in which the Commissioner of Fisheries, Mr. O'Malley, is performing his duties, and the splendid spirit with which the employees under him are carrying out the purposes of Congress. I know of no bureau directly reaching the people of our country which is really doing a better work for the welfare of the communities and the States where these hatcheries are located than the Bureau of Fisheries under Commissioner O'Malley. It is not altogether a question of propagation of trout and food fishes for the pleasure of the people, but the fish-cultural work and the food products that are being distributed, as well as the educational features that are being broadcast throughout the country, are well worthy of the praise and the acceptance by Congress of the amounts estimated therefor.

Further than this, it seems to me the work of the bureau is carried out in a manner showing the interest of the bureau in the proper spirit of the employees. I never have seen any indication whatsoever of favoritism being shown to any employee in the bureau or to any particular group of citizens.

All of this, I think, is commendatory of the man in charge, and it is therefore with pleasure that for one, having had dealings with the bureau and seeing the results of the work of those in charge here, as well as of the assistants in the field, I am very glad to add my word of praise of the manner in which the one in charge is administering the appropriations provided by Congress. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation of $35,000 for the fiscal year 1928 for a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma as an auxiliary to the fish-cultural station at Neosho, Mo., shall continue available for such purpose during the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call attention to this small item on page 89, which establishes a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma. Like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], I want to commend the Commissioner of Fisheries. I think he is a very efficient man. I hesitate at this time to invite attention to this item. But I want to invite attention not only to that but to three or four items in connection with it.

This appropriation of $35,000 was in the bill last year. I do not know the exact date of the approval of the act, but anyhow it was before the 3d day of March. The fiscal year began on July 1, 1927. There was only $35,000 involved in this item in the bill last year. By reading it you find that it is continued for the next year.

The State of Oklahoma is greatly interested in fish culture. We have some splendid fish and game laws. We have a wonderful fish and game warden there doing excellent work who wants to cooperate with the Federal Government. The entire citizenship of my State is interested in the propagation or culture of fish.

I want to express some disappointment that within the last six months the $35,000 in the appropriation bill of last year has not been expended.

Mr. BLANTON. How did the gentleman get the hand-out from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. HASTINGS. It was in the appropriation bill of last year, and I do not know of a better place in the whole country than eastern Oklahoma for the establishment of a fish-cultural station and the expenditure of this sum of money. What I am now taking this time for is to try and impress on the Commissioner of Fisheries that instead of having the money reappropriated for the year 1930 we hope he will see to it that this amount is expended in accordance with the direction of Congres during the next fiscal year.

I have looked up the hearings before the committee, and there is no real excuse given for the nonexpenditure of this money in Oklahoma the past year. As to some of these items, there is some excuse offered because they say that a good title could not be gotten to the land. Anybody knows, however, that in Oklahoma you could find a very large number of places where the people would have given the Government a site and a good title. I wanted to express my disappointment that the money has not been expended the past year, and serve notice on the Commissioner of Fisheries that the Oklahoma delegation will keep an eye on this item for the next year.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I want to inform the gentleman that there was no disposition on the part of anybody to retard the work in Oklahoma. On the contrary, the committee last year was particularly interested in giving Oklahoma a fish-cultural station. This was a matter over which the Commissioner of Fisheries had no control. It was the weather conditions that made it impossible for him to do the things he wanted to do. The gentleman's State suffered along with everybody else. The weather retarded work in the spring, and they had no opportunity to go out and get the fish that they put in the ponds until late in the summer, and the work was retarded and hindered during that time.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman means that it was retarded by the excessive floods?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am glad to have this explanation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This is a pro forma motion and I shall withdraw it as soon as I have called attention to the fact that it is natural that these various gentlemen who have gotten a hand-out should get up and pay their debt of gratitude. [Laughter.]

I shall never make a point of order against an item for any new fish-cultural station anywhere in the United States, especially where it is far removed from the coast. I know what it means to these States. It is a great boon to them. Not only does the gentleman from Oklahoma get his $35,000 hand-out——

Mr. HASTINGS. Unfortunately it is not in my district.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is for Oklahoma, and anything that is for Oklahoma the gentleman is for.

Mr. HASTINGS. That goes without saying.

Mr. BLANTON. When I was coming back from Texas after the holidays I met a lawyer from Muskogee, and he said that the Muskogee Congressman was the greatest one that operated on Capitol Hill, and I agreed with him.

I notice that Colorado gets a $30,000 hand-out from the committee, and Georgia got a $30,000 hand-out, and also the State of Nebraska has a $35,000 hand-out.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And I would like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that they did not locate any particular place in my State, but that in the southwestern part of the State of Nebraska we have a stream called the Republican River. I suggest that it be located there.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the governor will find a proper location for it all right.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And the State of Texas also got a $35,000 hand-out for a survey.

Mr. BLANTON. For which I am duly thankful, although it is not in my district. Anything for the State of Texas I am for. Wyoming got an $18,000 hand-out and Michigan got a $25,000 hand-out, and I am with all of you fellows. I do not blame you for getting up here and voicing gratitude for it. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has been enjoying his handout for several years, and he had to be grateful, too.

But I want to say to the committee that in handing out these handouts to our various friends, they should be a little more generous with the Members of Congress who seek to add a little sum of appropriation here and there that will benefit not any particular State, not any particular district, but the whole country, and that was the kind of an amendment I offered a while ago with respect to the Bureau of Standards' operations, in behalf of all American farmers.

The Clerk read as follows:

PATENT OFFICE

For the Commissioner of Patents and other personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $2,600,000: Provided, That of the amount herein appropriated not to exceed $25,000 may be used for special and temporary services of typists certified by the Civil Service Commission, who may be employed in such numbers, at $4 per diem, as may, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Patents, be necessary to keep current the work of furnishing manuscript copies of records.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking about this item regarding the Patent Office. As I recall it, the Patent Office takes in almost enough revenue to pay for the expenses of the office. It is true that for a number of years they have been quite behind in their work down there. Complaint has been made of that. An effort was made a year ago, possibly two years ago, to add to the appropriation for the purpose of enabling them to catch up with their work, or at least not to get further behind. I notice from the hearings that they have had a very large increase in the number of applications, about 3,000, and that as a result of that they are further behind than they were a year ago. At least that is my impression. The committee allowed about $80,000 more than their last year's appropriation. That is the recommendation of the Budget. I do not find any place in the hearings where the committee asked the commissioner, who is the man who ought to know about it, whether with that additional $80,000 he would be able not only to keep current with the work but at the same time do something toward catching up with the work.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, the commissioner gave us to understand that he was short of help. We were anxious to help and have been every year, but the growth of the office has been just a little in advance of the appropriations. Two years ago we helped them and a year ago, and this year we have given them $80,940 for the purpose of employing 46 men above the average; that is, good men. The commissioner informed us that it is hard to keep a man after he gets up to a certain grade because he then wants to get out and do something else.

Mr. NEWTON. About what salary will those 46 men receive?

Mr. SHREVE. They will start, as they all do, at a low sum, about $1,600 or $1,800 or $2,000, and then their progress is rapid if they show a disposition to take hold of the work.

Mr. NEWTON. Here is the situation: They can absorb only about so many new men every year.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. There is a great turnover in the office. If sufficient appropriation is not made for that, so that they can provide for the maximum number that they can absorb, they are never going to catch up. It is a source of considerable comment among the practicing patent lawyers. They have a very efficient Commissioner of Patents and the force is hard-working. It is self-supporting. There ought to be an effort made to give them every dollar that they can use, but apparently that question was not put to the commissioner himself.

Mr. SHREVE. The increase of $80,940 seemed necessary because of increase in the work; that is, increase in the number of applications this year. The work is now many months behind, particularly in all of the examining divisions, and if this condition is remedied it is imperative that the number of examining divisions be increased. The increase in the appropriation for the fiscal year 1929 will provide the necessary personnel for three additional divisions, which we understand will be sufficient to take care of the work for a while. It is our thought that we have given them enough money so that they will run along comfortably and satisfactorily during the year.

Mr. NEWTON. I know that the committee approached the question sympathetically, but where you have a bureau that is practically self-supporting, bringing revenue into the Government, it ought not to be pinched down in the same way as if it was a load on the Treasury.

Mr. SHREVE. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state to the House how far the revenues of the office meet the financial requirements?

Mr. SHREVE. In answer to the gentleman I shall quote from the hearings as follows:

Doctor KINNAN. In past years, Mr. SHREVE, we have turned in a surplus for many years into the Treasury, so that there is $7,000,000 or so to our credit now, of profit in the patent business in past years.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Until 10 years ago there was a surplus every year since the Civil War, and the aggregate surplus of all those years amounted to $7,082,400.50 on June 30, last, after deducting the deficits of the last several years. In addition to that, I believe the Patent Office Building was paid for out of Patent Office funds. So, the Patent Office has been a real going concern until the last few years, when, owing to increases in printing costs and increases in salaries, we have had a deficit, as I said, the past year amounting to $245,000. The year before it was $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Operating mine rescue cars and stations: For the investigation and improvement of mine rescue and first-aid methods and appliances and the teaching of mine safety, rescue, and first-aid methods, including the exchange in part payment for operation, maintenance, and repair of mine rescue trucks, the construction of temporary structures and the repair, maintenance, and operation of mine rescue cars and Government-owned mine rescue stations and appurtenances thereto, including the purchase and equipment of one mine rescue car not to exceed $45,000, and including personal services, traveling expenses and subsistence, equipment, and supplies, including the purchase and exchange in part payment therefor of cooks' uniforms, goggles, gloves, and such other articles or equipment as may be necessary in the operation of mine rescue cars and stations, including not to exceed $14,140 for personal services in the District of Columbia, $342,630: Provided, That of this amount not to exceed $500 may be expended for the purchase and bestowal of trophies in connection with mine rescue and first-aid contests.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on page 96, lines 17, 18, 19, and 20, beginning with the word "Provided," I make the point of order that it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAWLEY). The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order on lines 17 to 20. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] desire to be heard?

Mr. SHREVE. It has been carried heretofore.

Mr. BLANTON. I know; but it is legislation just the same. There is no law for it.

Mr. SHREVE. It is merely a limitation.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. It is an express authorization without law. It is not a limitation at all. It is an express authorization.

Mr. SHREVE. It is a limitation on the life-saving branch of the service.

Mr. BLANTON. It is an express authorization to spend money without legal authority for it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania refer to any legislation authorizing this?

Mr. SHREVE. There is no legislation for it. It is just carried on. It is an item that has been in the bill heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oil, gas, and oil-shale investigations: For inquiries and investigations and dissemination of information concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of petroleum, natural gas, and oil shale, including economic conditions affecting the industry, with a view to economic development and conserving resources through the prevention of waste; for the purchase of newspapers relating to the oil, gas, and allied industries: Provided, That section 192 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to such purchase of newspapers from this appropriation; and for every other expense incident thereto, including supplies, equipment, expenses of travel and subsistence, purchase, exchange as part payment for, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, $198,260, of which amount not to exceed $25,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the following language on page 98, beginning in line 6:

Provided, That section 192 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to such purchase of newspapers from this appropriation.

That is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill. It seeks to change our present Revised Statutes.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma: Page 98, line 12, after the word "vehicle," strike out "$198,260" and insert in lieu thereof "$210,760."

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Congress, I hope I may have your attention for a moment, because I want to call your attention to a matter in which every one of you is interested. In offering this amendment I want to apologize to the committee which wrote this bill for not having taken the matter up with the committee. The fact is that before it was called to my attention the Budget was made up and the committee was ready to make their report. I am sure if I had appeared before the committee on this matter I would have received the courteous treatment we all receive when we appear before them on other matters.

What I am seeking to do is to add the sum of $12,500 to the appropriation for the Bureau of Mines for investigating the matter of using gas in bringing from the earth more of the crude petroleum deposited in the sands thereof. I want to call your attention, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, to the fact that to-day, under the old method, without scientific investigation, although the United States is producing over 2,000,000 barrels of oil daily, we are actually, according to the Bureau of Mines, recovering only 20 per cent of the oil deposits in the oil-bearing sands in the oil fields. It is estimated by the Bureau of Mines and by experts that through the use of gas in forcing the oil through the sands and into the wells that have been drilled already an increase of 20 per cent in the recovery of oil could within a very short time be brought about.

Now, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, let us see what that means to the people of the United States. Back yonder, in the days before the automobile industry was developed, when we used a little gasoline only for cleaning clothes, and things like that, according to the Bureau of Mines the recovery of gasoline from crude oil was only 6 to 8 per cent. Since we have begun to use it and since the Congress and others have furnished the money to make these scientific investigations, the recovery from a barrel of crude oil, of gasoline—a commodity that is growing in use in this country every day—has increased to 38 per cent of that barrel of crude oil. If we have increased, by making scientific investigations, the amount of gasoline taken from a barrel of crude oil from 8 per cent to 38 per cent, certainly that has been of economic value. If we can increase the amount of production of oil by giving our Bureau of Mines the money with which to study this problem and bring forth 20 per cent more of oil, it amounts, my friends, to 483,950 barrels a day that can be, or should be, and must be, brought from the earth to finally meet the demands of the automobile industry and the demand for other petroleum products.

Not only that, but I want to call your attention to the effect of scientific study in the matter of the production of oil and gas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I want to call your attention, if I may, to the fact that when the great Cushing oil field was discovered and developed there was no provision for using the gas from producing oil wells, and that on a damp day it was dangerous to drive through the field by reason of escaping gas. The Bureau of Mines made a study of this situation. They were in the forefront in the effort to utilize this gas. They suggested formulas and machinery that could be used to convert this natural gas into gasoline, with the result that last year this casinghead gas was converted into 1,000,000,000 gallons of gasoline. Had it not been for scientific research, such as I am asking for in this amendment, this gas would have gone to waste and been lost forever and the price of gasoline last year would probably have been higher to the consumers. If we have had that result, can we not now justify ourselves in making a little further appropriation to go further into a scientific investigation pertaining to this useful and much-needed commodity?

Let me say this to you also as a further argument: The Bureau of Mines informs me that to-day the crude-oil production is coming from practically only 2 per cent of the wells that have been drilled in the United States. Why? Because there are 300,000 or 400,000 little wells producing a barrel or 2 barrels per day that are not paying their operators. The result is that unless some means are taken to increase the production and get some more of this oil out of the ground that is being left there they must be plugged by their operators and forever put out of existence. When you plug one of those wells, and when you quit operating one of them, water breaks in and then the 40 or 60 per cent of the oil you are not getting to-day is drowned out and gone from the people of the United States forever.

I also call your attention to the fact that the United States Government, on the production of petroleum, on the refining of petroleum, and in studying the great petroleum industry spends only $198,260 per year. I am asking you for $12,500 more in order that the Bureau of Mines may begin a study of the proposition, and in order that the Bureau of Mines may provide a method for lifting out more of this oil, bringing it to your constituency, and saving to the people more of this great natural resource.

To-day I ask for an additional $12,500, explaining that I did not present it to the committee. I present it to-day, because so long as there is delay and so long as there is no method brought forth to bring out this additional amount of oil these small wells, which could be preserved, will be plugged, and any delay means a loss of oil and means a loss of petroleum products to the entire Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to disagree with the gentleman. We have a regular and orderly procedure in the House which the gentleman did not follow in this case. I will mention that first. In addition to that, the Director of the Bureau of Mines has made no recommendation in favor of the proposition the gentleman presents to the committee. The committee having the matter in charge has not considered it, because it has not been brought before us; the Bureau of the Budget has not considered it; and, as a matter of fact, nobody has considered it.

I want to say to the gentleman that $198,000 is carried in the bill for matters of this kind, and there is money enough now to take care of the investigation the gentleman would like to have made.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I do not want to quarrel with the gentleman, but I want to call attention to the fact that the appropriation is the same as it was last year.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; it is the same; but they have worked out a lot of propositions they had last year and are now ready to take up the gentleman's proposition if there is sufficient merit in it.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I want to say to the gentleman that the "gentleman from Oklahoma" never presents to the House any proposition in which there is not some merit.

Mr. SHREVE. Of course, I realize that.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I want to call attention to the fact that this thing is so important that the State Legislature of Oklahoma, which contributes a part of this money, raised its appropriation last year in the same amount.

Mr. SHREVE. If it is as important as the gentleman suggests it is, he can rest assured the Bureau of Mines will discover it before long.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I want to state, as I have stated before, that I did not present the matter to the committee, but when the gentleman speaks about the Bureau of Mines not mentioning it, I want to call attention to the fact that we have a condition prevailing around here where a man in the department will say, "I can not even mention it to the committee unless they ask me about it."

Mr. SHREVE. That practice does not obtain in our department.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 18, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Oil-shale investigations: For development of oil shale, including purchase or mining and transportation of shale, operation, repairs, and alteration of plant, the construction, maintenance, and repair of necessary camp buildings and appurtenances thereto, and the alteration, operation, and maintenance of experimental refinery, and for all necessary expenses incident thereto, including personal services, supplies, equipment, traveling expenses, the purchase, not exceeding $1,200, operation, maintenance, repair, and exchange in part payment for, of motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicles, $75,000, of which amount not to exceed $6,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question.

I have taken this paragraph as a type of many paragraphs that occur in this bill as the basis of the inquiry which I am about to make. I do this because of the fact that I have gone through the record of the hearings and I think the procedure of the committee is exactly as I would like to see it with reference to every one of the items. The point I have in mind is this: With these recurring appropriations that provide for investigations almost without number in this and in other bills, is it the practice of the Committee on Appropriations each time one of these items is reached to carefully interrogate the people involved to see whether or not there is a real purpose served by the investigational work that is provided for? Please bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, I picked this out because I have gone over your record and find your procedure is exactly in line with this thought in this particular case. Is this true with reference to every item?

Mr. SHREVE. I am very pleased to inform the gentleman, because the committee is rather proud of the work it is doing, that it is the practice of the committee to examine every single item that comes before it, regardless of whether we had it last year or the year before or at any other time; and in the case the gentleman refers to as an example, we cut off the appropriation entirely not very long ago and only left enough money to guard the property; but later on we concluded to go on with the investigation. These matters are all carefully considered by every member of the committee.

Mr. KETCHAM. Does the gentleman think that is the practice with reference to every subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SHREVE. Every committee I know anything about. The appropriating committees, with the exception of our own, are the most hard-worked committees in the House.

Mr. KETCHAM. The difficulty, of course, is that when one of these investigational propositions is launched and supported by a very tangible appropriation it is a very difficult matter to get it out of the way unless there is very careful interrogation every year.

Mr. SHREVE. We realize that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Did I misunderstand the gentleman, or do I understand him to say that his committee is one of the most hard-boiled committees?

Mr. SHREVE. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Or hard worked?

Mr. SHREVE. I said our committee was the exception. I said the other committees were hard working, but the subcommittee of which I have the honor of being the chairman, handling four great departments of the Government, has enough work to keep it busy for over two months in preparing the bill for presentation to the House.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Persons employed during the fiscal year 1929 in field work outside of the District of Columbia under the Bureau of Mines may be detailed temporarily for service in the District of Columbia for purposes of preparing results of their field work; all persons so detailed shall be paid in addition to their regular compensation only traveling expenses in going to and returning therefrom: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the payment to employees of the Bureau of Mines of their necessary expenses, or per diem in lieu of subsistence, while on temporary detail in the District of Columbia for purposes only of consultation or investigations on behalf of the United States. All details made hereinunder, and the purposes of each, during the preceding fiscal year shall be reported in the annual estimates of appropriations to Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereof.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the language contained in the proviso beginning on page 99, line 24, and embracing the language down to and including line 8, on page 100, as being legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and an attempt to change existing law. There is no law authorizing this.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. Does the gentleman from Texas contend it is unlawful or there is no authority to pay employees detailed or summoned to the District of Columbia for the purpose of consultation their necessary expenses or per diem?

Mr. BLANTON. Their per diem and subsistence, no. There is no law at present authorizing that, and every time there has been an attempt to transfer employees from the field to the District of Columbia by the departments they have come here with this kind of a proposition to except them from the provisions of the law. You will see that under these provisions first you can not do it and then they provide that you can do it.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, the general subsistence act covers all this.

The CHAIRMAN. There is ample law to pay the expenses of Government employees for traveling under direction of the Government and on Government business. This proviso merely insures that nothing else in the section shall prevent such payment which is otherwise authorized by law. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Then this is surplusage, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Government fuel yards: For the purchase and transportation of fuel; storing and handling of fuel in yards; maintenance and operation of yards and equipment, including motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for inspectors, purchase of equipment, rentals, and all other expenses requisite for and incident thereto, including personal services in the District of Columbia, the unexpended balance of the appropriations heretofore made for these purposes is reappropriated and made available for such purposes for the fiscal year 1929, and for payment of obligations for such purposes of prior years, and of such sum not exceeding $500 shall be available to settle claims for damages caused to private property by motor vehicles used in delivering fuel: Provided, That all moneys received from the sales of fuel shall be credited to this appropriation and be available for the purposes of this paragraph: Provided further, That the requirements of sections 3711 and 3713 of the Revised Statutes relative to the weighing of coal and wood and the separate certificate as to the weight, measurement, or quantity of coal and wood purchased shall not apply to purchases by the Government fuel yards at free-on-board destinations outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order, first, as to the language embraced on page 101, beginning in line 3—

Provided, That all moneys received from the sales of fuel shall be credited to this appropriation and be available for the purposes of this paragraph—because it is legislation unauthorized by law, and should come out of the bill.

And, also, I make a point of order to the second proviso—

Provided, further, That the requirements of sections 3711 and 3713 of the Revised Statutes relative to the weighing of coal and wood and the separate certificate as to the weights, measurement, or quantity of coal and wood purchased shall not apply to purchases by the Government fuel yards at free-on-board destinations outside of the District of Columbia—because it is likewise legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill, and should come out on point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The points of order are sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the fiscal year 1929 the head of any department or independent establishment of the Government having funds available for scientific investigations and requiring cooperative work by the Bureau of Mines on scientific investigations within the scope of the functions of that bureau and which it is unable to perform within the limits of its appropriations may, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, transfer to the Bureau of Mines such sums as may be necessary to carry on such investigations. The Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer on the books of the Treasury Department any sums which may be authorized hereunder, and such amounts shall be placed to the credit of the Bureau of Mines for the performance of work for the department or establishment from which the transfer is made: Provided, That any sums transferred by any department or independent establishment of the Government to the Bureau of Mines for cooperative work in connection with this appropriation may be expended in the same manner as sums appropriated herein may be expended.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the entire paragraph, beginning on page 105 at line 11 and extending to and including line 4 on page 106, as being legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and an attempt to change existing law.

There is no law now which authorizes a transfer from one department to another of unexpended balances, and this is a dangerous policy, I may state to my friend from Pennsylvania, and to the floor leader and the Members of the House, for us to embark upon—to permit all the departments, if they want to do so, to transfer their unexpended balances to any other department. It occurred here a few years ago that during the month of June a certain chief of an independent establishment found he was going to have an unexpended balance on hand July 1; he picked out a whole bunch of his favorite employees and divided that sum among them, which increased their salaries a certain amount for the month of June only. This was done just to use up the money before the end of the fiscal year, and it is something that ought not to occur.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, that does not occur under these appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. It could occur.

Mr. SHREVE. This is a very necessary provision. If one of the departments has some investigations they want conducted, for instance, by the Bureau of Mines, it is given to the bureau and they do the investigating, and the work is done just the same as such work is done by any other bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. Where is the authority of law for this?

Mr. SHREVE. We do not need any authority for it.

Mr. BLANTON. It is an invasion of the present law.

Mr. SHREVE. It may be an invasion, but it is a rightful invasion. It is rendering a valuable service. Does the gentleman want to prevent these departments from cooperating?

Mr. BLANTON. We are not discussing the merits of it; we are discussing the lawful authority for it. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is no law that authorizes the transfer of balances.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether a department or an independent establishment of the Government having funds available for scientific work has not the right to expend it for that purpose?

Mr. BLANTON. They have a right to expend it, but they have not the right to transfer it to some other department unless Congress authorizes it by legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Instead of paying it to an outside agency might they not pay it to the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. BLANTON. I think not without authority of law. This money is appropriated to a certain department.

The CHAIRMAN. If they pay it to the Bureau of Mines for the work, does it not come within the appropriation?

Mr. BLANTON. They have to have a law to transfer it. The Chair is a good parliamentarian. We are appropriating money, say, for the Navy or the Army for scientific purposes. No one would contend that the department could turn over an unexpended balance to another department without authority of law.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not turning money over to another department to use as it sees fit. If the Navy Department was to do a certain piece of work, it would be authorized to expend the money for that purpose and they could have it done anywhere else. If it hires another department to do the work, it is a lawful expenditure of the money.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not hire it; it turns the money over to that department for it to expend.

The CHAIRMAN. Only for that purpose for which the money is appropriated. The money is received by the Bureau of Mines for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a dangerous practice to establish here; it is a dangerous departure from the present rules and regulations.

Mr. TILSON. The usual test is whether the thing proposed can be done without the provision. I have no doubt that a department or bureau having money to expend for a certain object can have another department or bureau perform that service without this provision the same as it could hire an outside individual to do it. The paragraph in the bill is a provision to enable the transfer on the books of funds from one department to another. The original department secures the performance of a lawful work for which it can lawfully expend the money, and this is only a matter of convenience between the different departments in their bookkeeping.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman must remember that this may come up in the future to plague him, because if you pass this provision with these arguments and the statement from the Chair and the statement from the Republican floor leader, you will find that the departments will indiscriminately turn over balances.

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman has not read the provision carefully. It is not an indiscriminate turning over of any funds. It allows one bureau or department to have work done that another bureau or department is prepared to do, and the transfer is simply on the books.

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman from Connecticut is absolutely right and the practice has been such for 30 years.

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to what the Chair has said, this refers to money appropriated to be expended by any department or independent establishment of Government having funds available for scientific investigation, and this is expending the money for the purposes for which it was appropriated. The money is expended by getting the Bureau of Mines to do the work. In other words, it turns over the money appropriated to the Bureau of Mines for the purpose of doing the work for which the money was appropriated. It is not in any sense legislation, but a direction by Congress as to the manner in which the money appropriated by Congress for a certain purpose should be expended by the department. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question. If I am correctly informed, the item on page 105 cuts the appropriation $25,000 from the amount requested and approved by the Budget. This is a work of so much importance that I wondered if the gentleman is convinced that this amount will give the bureau all that it needs for the purpose.

As I read the hearings, two or three of the Secretaries recommended a higher amount. I ask the gentleman whether he thinks the amount here given is sufficient to carry on this work, or was there some particular reason for making the cut from the amount recommended.

Mr. SHREVE. The committee made a careful study of it in the last year, and continued the study this year, and from the best information we can get we have appropriated sufficient funds to carry on the work.

Mr. COLTON. I notice the heads of two or three departments recommended an addition of $25,000, and that that amount was approved by the Budget.

Mr. SHREVE. That met with the approval of the full committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase or exchange of professional and scientific books, law books, and books to complete broken sets, periodicals, directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the Bureau of Mines, there is hereby made available from any appropriations made for such bureau not to exceed $3,500;

Total, Bureau of Mines, $2,532,080.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last paragraph. This completes the consideration of the appropriations for the Department of Commerce. I want to call the attention of the House to the increased expenses in this department for the past few years. It would not be fair, I take it, to compare the present expenditures with those preceding the war, because the war opened up new expenditures. I shall take, therefore, one of the peak years after the war, which embraces all of the increase in salaries, and so forth. I take the year 1922. In the fiscal year 1922 we appropriated for this department $22,496,745. That amount embraces the appropriations for both the Patent Office and for the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. NEWTON. They were not in the Department of Commerce in 1922.

Mr. BLANTON. They were not in the department then, but they are now, and to be fair I am adding the amount that was appropriated for them. For 1922 we gave the Department of Commerce $18,651,805; we gave the Patent Office $2,264,040; and we gave the Bureau of Mines $1,580,900, totaling $22,496,745. That was the total appropriation for the peak year 1922. For this year, under our distinguished Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, we are about to expend $36,630,450. There is a difference of approximately $15,000,000. It will be remembered that in 1922, the peak year, embracing both the Bureau of Mines and the Patent Office, the total expenditures were only $22,496,745; and yet this next fiscal year we are increasing that amount by approximately $15,000,000.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Would the gentleman like to cut out any particular portion of the $36,000,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. It just shows extravagance.

Mr. NEWTON. Where is the extravagance?

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to leave that for the taxpayers of the United States to determine.

Mr. NEWTON. That is a very safe place for the gentleman to leave it.

Mr. BLANTON. The taxpayers know of the increases that we gave the department, that were embraced within the fiscal year 1922, and they will compare those expenditures in that peak year with this amount of $36,000,000. You can say that it is necessary, and that you are in a hurry to adjourn tonight, but it is also necessary that we as the representatives of the people should call their attention to what is going on here in Washington all of the time. Some of these days I am going to read into this RECORD the correspondence that I had with your Mr. Secretary Hoover, when our President Wilson appointed him Food Administrator and he rented the Gordon Hotel on Sixteenth Street as his administration building. One of your distinguished Republicans on the Republican side of the aisle at that time got up and crucified him because of extravagance in paying so much more rent for that Gordon Hotel than the then occupant had been paying. I shall put into the RECORD the letter that I wrote to Mr. Hoover, hoping to be able to defend him on the floor against the Republican accusations, and his reply in which he said not only had he paid the amount for the Gordon Hotel that the gentleman had accused him of, but that he had paid nearly one-third more than that Republican statesman had knowledge of. I shall read that into the RECORD at a future time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Traveling expenses of special agents and employees; experts and temporary assistance for field service outside of the District of Columbia, to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $8 per day; personal services in the District of Columbia not to exceed $29,500, including also temporary statistical clerks, stenographers, and typewriters in the District of Columbia, to be selected from civil-service registers, the same person to be employed for not more than six consecutive months; traveling expenses of officers and employees, purchase of periodicals, documents, price quotations, and reports and materials for reports and bulletins of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, $80,000: Provided, That the Commissioner of Labor is authorized to collect statistical reports through local special agents paid on piece-price basis.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the proviso, which seeks to change the present law. It is unauthorized on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman refer to the proviso on line 16, page 109?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; lines 16 to 19. It seeks to change the law in reference to the manner in which employees shall be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman maintain that there is any law that now prohibits the Commissioner of Labor from collecting statistical reports through special agents paid on piecemeal prices?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. He has authority only through regularly employed agents provided for by classification.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman direct the Chair's attention to any such statute?

Mr. BLANTON. It is the general organic law of every department, but there is no organic law which authorizes the employment of agents by piece price. I call the Chair's attention to this. This language would permit a department to pay any salary it wanted to to these agents. It leaves it discretionary with the department as to what it shall pay. There is no law that authorizes that at all.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, we will read the law. I read:

Functions of bureau, powers of Secretary of Labor: The Bureau of Labor Statistics, under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, shall collect, collate, and report at least once each year, or oftener if necessary, full and complete statistics of the conditions of labor and the products and distribution of the products of the same, and to this end said Secretary shall have power to employ any or either of the bureaus provided for his department and to rearrange such statistical work and to distribute or consolidate the same as may be deemed desirable in the public interests; and said Secretary shall also have authority to call upon other departments of the Government for statistical data and results obtained by them; and said Secretary of Labor may collate, arrange, and publish such statistical information so obtained in such manner as to him may seem wise.

Mr. BLANTON. And nowhere does it provide that he shall employ agents and have such work done by piecework. It provides only that he may use the regular employees, who are to be paid as fixed by the classification act. That law is plain. And my point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not refer the Chair to any provision authorizing the employment of these persons as agents on a piecework basis?

Mr. SHREVE. This is the only law on the subject, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regulating immigration: For enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the contract labor laws; cost of reports of decisions of the Federal courts, and digests thereof, for the use of the Commissioner General of Immigration; salaries and expenses of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed to enforce said laws, including not to exceed $167,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, together with persons authorized by law to be detailed for duty at Washington, D. C.; traveling expenses; maintenance expenses of insane alien deportees detained abroad while en route to the country of destination; enforcement of the provisions of the act of February 5, 1917, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," and acts amendatory thereof and in addition thereto; necessary supplies, including exchange of typewriting machines, alterations and repairs, and for all other expenses authorized by said act; preventing the unlawful entry of aliens into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto; expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expenses of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation; refunding of head tax, maintenance bills, and immigration fines upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that collection was made through error of Government officers; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, $7,110,000: Provided, That $1,755,000 of this amount shall be available only for coast and land-border patrol: Provided further, That the purchase, exchange, use, maintenance, and operation of motor vehicles and allowances for horses, including motor vehicles and horses owned by immigration officers when used on official business required in the enforcement of the immigration and Chinese exclusion laws outside of the District of Columbia, may be contracted for and the cost thereof paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of those laws, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe: Provided further, That not more than $150,000 of the sum appropriated herein may be expended in the purchase and maintenance of such motor vehicles, and of such sum of $150,000 not more than $125,000 shall be available for the purchase and maintenance of motor vehicles for coast and land-border patrol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 111, line 8, after the word "Labor," strike out "$7,110,000" and insert "$7,610,000," and on line 9 strike out "$1,755,000" and insert "$1,955,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the amount requested of the Budget Bureau by the Department of Immigration for the entire expenditures under this title, regulating immigration, including the whole subject, you will find on page 110, beginning on line 5, and all of page 111, was $7,800,000. The committee has recommended to the House $7,110,000, of which $1,150,000 shall be available only for coast and land border patrol. My amendment, which has to change the figures in two places, calls for an addition of $500,000, so that the $7,110,000 sum would read "$7,610,000, of which $1,955,000 shall be available only for coast and land patrol." In other words, the amendment proposes an addition for the enforcement of the immigration law of $500,000, of which $200,000 shall be for the enlargement of the border patrol.

Gentlemen, you would be very much interested to know what the border patrol has done. We can not give all the proposed additional money to the border patrol, because the patrolmen are policemen and not warrant officers, and whenever they make arrests other officers are required to carry out the next steps. But in the last year, even though at times they had to mark time, they examined 1,250,000 vehicle passengers and a large number of pedestrians, and 492,000 automobiles, and so on; they apprehended 19,322 persons; captured 12,000 smuggled aliens, and more important than all that they captured 832 smugglers of aliens. They captured 786 automobiles and a number of boats and other vehicles of transportation, which they had to turn over to the various other agencies—prohibition, narcotic, agricultural, justice, and so forth.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As to these automobiles which they captured, of course they had to sell those and the money went into the Treasury?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Most of them went to the Treasury and Justice Departments, and they made the sale. There is no law for the Immigration Service to hold them for its own use.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Therefore it is necessary to raise the appropriation so that we can have an adequate force with which to do the work?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. I admit that the subcommittee has been as liberal as it thought it could be. I submit that this amendment is not an unreasonable sum. An additional $500,000 for the enforcement of the law that we have enacted in the hope of keeping aliens out of the country is not much. We must stop the alien-smuggling system. The entire Immigration Service comes within $1,900,000 of paying all its expenses, and if we were to include the money coming from the Naturalization Service that cost sum would be reduced. Immigration visa procedure also brings in other great sums not counted here. Through the head tax and through fines on steamships and others something like $5,000,000 comes back in the Federal Treasury, but not to the immigrant fund as it was in the old days. The opening of the Peace Bridge at Buffalo necessitated an increase of $50,000 in the cost in immigration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am sorry I have not more time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman want additional time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I shall not ask for it.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. The committee has given this matter very careful investigation. The committee spent several months last summer in making a personal examination and investigation on the borders to find out just what the alien situation is. When we came home and at the first meeting of the committee we made up our minds to increase the amount of the appropriation, and we recommended an increase of $235,000 over the amount fixed by the Bureau of the Budget.

I would like to repeat just what the Assistant Secretary, Mr. White, said. Before the committee the other day he said, in answer to a question whether he had any idea as to how many aliens there are in this country to-day that really ought to be deported under existing law:

Mr. WHITE. No; I have not.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have you any way of estimating it?

Mr. WHITE. My guess is just as valuable as any other man's, probably, and there are all sorts of guesses; everybody is making a guess at the number. All I can tell you is there are thousands of them.

Mr. BOX. He said they were just scratching the surface.

Again I read:

Mr. BOX. To what extent are we meeting the demands for deportation; that is, those covered by the law? You say we are getting out 12,000, and if we had the increased appropriation mentioned you could increase that approximately 10 per cent. Will that take care of the work that ought to be done under the present law, Mr. Secretary?

Mr. WHITE. Oh, no; we are taking care of the institutional cases now very satisfactorily. As to cases outside of institutions, we are not even scratching the surface.

Mr. BOX. That is how I feel about that.

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. BOX. You would not say we are not doing half of it, but then you know we are doing nothing like all of it?

Mr. WHITE. No; I have not any idea how much of it could be done; all I know is that according to my best judgment, you could use an appropriation easily of $10,000,000 for immigration and it could be used economically and efficiently; but that would require a much larger organization to do it.

You must build up more machinery, and it will take a year or two to get started with it. This committee should get to work and bring out new legislation which will provide for and take care of these things. I believe there are enough old-fashioned men in this House like myself who believe that the appropriation should follow legislation and not anticipate it, and if we allowed this extra $500,000 we are simply anticipating the facts, because they have no machinery to administer it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is no law to say that there shall be 500 border patrolmen?

Mr. SHREVE. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And we find in the first year the border patrol existed it turned back 11,000 or 12,000. We have the figures here.

The figures are all here. Now, then, it is not anticipation to say that with a small increase in the force—we are not asking you to readjust the pay—they will do still more and keep these people out of the jails of the towns, keep them out of the machinery of actual deportation, do wonders in that way, and in the long run be a great economy.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, after making this careful survey last year we feel we have granted all that should be granted for this service. We had heard there were all kinds of people coming across the border, but I want to say that the number coming across is comparatively small. This very highly efficient organization which the Department of Labor has created along the border is keeping men out. As I said the other day, down in San Antonio, in the matter of two or three months, there were 1,900 of them sent back and 500 more sent out by the customs office and other agencies, the narcotic service, and other services. So these men are being kept out. We talked to the men along the border and we got our information from them; we got information from the immigration men and from the farmers, and I want to say that in the farming section the farmers are rendering most valuable assistance. Everybody agreed that these men were being kept on their own side of the border.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the committee, it is unquestionably true, as stated by members of the committee, that the Assistant Secretary of Labor testified before our committee that the fund as now being provided, with the increase carried in this bill, will take care of the work of the present organization. The gentleman states that accurately. In the brief time I have I will call the attention of the committee to the situation with reference to that organization and its work. The work done during the present year was not nearly adequate because the funds provided by last year's appropriation were not sufficient. Much of the time they could not work for lack of expense money. For some three or four months they were unable to carry forward the work they ought to have been doing. They say the present organization is utterly inadequate. I think myself there ought to be some definite and affirmative provision for an increase of that organization, but I think that has not been the manner in which it has been built up. The department has had this fund provided and has from time to time increased it, as the funds and the work warranted the increases. Members of this committee should have heard the statement of Assistant Secretary White to the effect that we are barely scratching the surface in the way of deporting dangerous aliens. We are deporting now, or will deport under this appropriation, about 12,000 per year. With the indulgence of the committee, I read one statement made by him, from page 19 of the hearings heretofore referred to. This question was asked of Assistant Secretary White:

To what extent are we meeting the demands for deportations; that is, those covered by the present law? You say we are getting out some 12,000 per year, and if we had the increased appropriation mentioned you could increase that approximately 10 per cent. Will that take care of the work that ought to be done under the present law, Mr. Secretary?

Oh, no; we are taking care of the institutional cases now very satisfactorily. As to cases outside of institutions, we are not even scratching the surface.

The people of the United States want to deport these aliens who are now subject to deportation under the present very moderate, and, I think, insufficient laws. The Government is only deporting a small percentage of those subject to deportation. Our Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has reported and this House has twice passed a bill requiring more deportations but both have failed in the Senate. While I shall not undertake to criticize the action of the Committee on Appropriations, in view of the considerate manner in which it has treated this subject in this present appropriation bill, I want the House to understand that the United States Government is not taking care of this problem. I do not see how the organization can be enlarged under the present status of the law without an additional appropriation. An additional appropriation is required. If it is made, the organization can be enlarged and made to do the work expected of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee at this point to the statement of Mr. White, made during the hearing:

Mr. TAYLOR. Have you any definite idea, Mr. Secretary, of just how many aliens there are in this country to-day who really ought to be deported under existing law?

Mr. WHITE. No; I have not.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have you any way of estimating it?

Mr. WHITE. My guess is just as valuable as any other man's, probably, and there are all sorts of guesses. Everybody is making a guess as to the number. All I can tell you is there are thousands of them.

So it is all simply a matter of guesswork.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Gentlemen, no one in the House is more interested in the enforcement of the immigration law than I am, and every member of this subcommittee has manifested a like interest. We have gone out of our way on many occasions to make special inquiry with a view of providing additional funds for the enforcement of this law, and in order that you may know what has been done in the way of increasing the appropriations for this service I wish to submit some figures which I think you will grant shows a growing interest, and that a very helpful hand has been extended each year by Congress to this important service.

In 1925 we increased the appropriation $1,200,000 over the previous year. The next year we increased it $588,000, the next year $1,000,000, and the next year $575,000, which sum represents the increase which the pending bill carries for the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. White, the Assistant Secretary, was before the committee, and he felt that the increase carried in this bill would adequately provide for the needs of their present force.

I am sure that the legislative committee recognizes the importance at this time of providing some further enabling legislation relative to unlawful entries and deportations. They have made efforts in the past to pass such legislation. When the bill favorably reported by the committee to the last Congress shall be finally written into law, it will greatly aid the Labor Department and its officials in the enforcement of every phase of the immigration law.

There are many embarrassing situations that now present themselves to enforcement officers. I may mention some that the committee has sought to remedy in the deportation law just referred to. Chief among them are the short periods of limitation fixed in the act of 1917. The committee has wisely recommended an extension of that period so that when officers go in search of those unlawfully here, they will not be met with the answer, "Oh, we have been here for three years."

The one fruitful source through which so many to-day are unlawfully entering the United States is through the seaman's route, and to these the three-year limitation applies. Many gain entrance through that source. Some well-considered legislation is required to stop this gap.

I stated the other day, and I think the committee recognizes the force of it, since in their bill they sought to partially remedy it, until you provide punitive punishment for those who repeat their offense against our immigration law you will not discourage offenders nor effectively aid our officers to keep them out. You may vote all the money you will—$10,000,000, if you please—in order to deport those unlawfully here, and yet until your law is changed such deportees can return by the next ship, and when they are again and yet again apprehended, all you can do under existing law is to give them safe passage back to their own country at large expense to our Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman will recall the bill which this House has twice passed fixing penalties for particular offenses.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Certainly, and what I am leading up to is this: When you shall have done what the committee itself recognizes as urgently important, you will have largely helped in the enforcement of the law, and thereby save the necessity of large annual increases in the appropriation for deportations.

You are not going to ask this House to recklessly spend money seeking to enforce a law that you admit is weak and should be strengthened, or to deport men who can repeatedly return and charge you with the expense of again deporting them, yet provide no punitive penalty for any offense.

You must, indeed, write a law with teeth in it and one, if you please, that will truly, yet effectively, show your interest in the enforcement of the spirit and letter of our immigration law. I am not criticizing the legislative committee, but I wish to emphasize to the House the importance of cooperating with such committee in the passage of a real effective deportation law that will prove a menace to all who seek to violate it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. My friend has taken a great deal of interest in the border patrol and has helped to increase the number of members in the patrol. I want to commend the gentleman for it, and I also want to ask my friend a question, because I have not the data before me. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and myself represent the entire border between Mexico and Texas. How many men have we to patrol that border of about 1,000 miles?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I can not now give the gentleman the exact number further than to say we had practically all of those young men on the southern border before us, and we found them active, intelligent, and efficient. They were agreed on this point that a punitive penalty against offenders would help in the enforcement of the law far more than merely to increase their numbers.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to state that this is very rough country and inaccessible for automobiles.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I understand that there are somewhere about 400 of the border patrol on the southern boundary.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If you increase that number by 50 or 100 you would not have so many persons to deport, for you would have an efficient constabulary there.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Let me say that I am glad to have any observation from my good friend from Texas, because he strives to always be helpful. But with reference to our border patrol he must admit that it is now efficient. Those in charge state there are but few aliens from across-sea countries that enter through our southern borders. The parties they intercept and turn back are usually Mexicans whom you permit to enter provided they pay a certain fixed fee and apply through regular channels.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words in order to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question. I notice on page 62 of the hearings a statement made by Mr. Wagner that it would require $800,000 to properly take care of the transportation item.

Mr. SHREVE. That is another guess; nobody knows anything about it.

Mr. LEAVITT. A little later Mr. Wagner states that it has been necessary, with the officers they have had, to defer deporting many whom they have ascertained should be deported, and they have deferred making investigations.

Mr. SHREVE. That is why we gave this supplementary estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was taken; and on a devision (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were 67 ayes and 78 noes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SHREVE and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 72 ayes and 83 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment. On page 111, line 8, to strike out the figures "$7,110,000" and insert "$7,160,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 111, line 8, strike out the figures "$7,110,000" and insert "$7,160,000."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is in line with my effort to get a decent living wage for all Government employees. We have an Immigration Service, and I am sure if it were investigated it would be found that a large number of men, women, and employees are serving at a ridiculously low rate of wages. Some of the older men who served with me on Ellis Island 20 years ago are still receiving wages of $1,200, $1,400, and $1,500, particularly the laborers, messengers, guards, and some of the interpreters.

After the statements made by the gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Alabama of the importance of this work, and the good work they are doing, I do not see how this House can refuse to increase the appropriation so as to enable the Secretary of Labor to establish at least a minimum wage of $1,800.

I do not believe a man or woman in the employ of the United States Government should receive less than $1,800 a year.

Mr. O'CONNELL. And is it not a fact that they handle more immigrants in that station than in any other station in the country?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They did prior to the quota law, and I dare say they do now. But I am not speaking particularly for Ellis Island. I speak for the whole service, where you have laborers, messengers, and guards, and interpreters, and the lower grade of inspectors. I do not know what the committee will do, though I have a very good idea; but I think that to economize on the wages of laborers and charwomen and interpreters, who are getting $1,200 and $1,300 and $1,400 a year, is a very poor way to economize.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BOX. One of the difficulties that aided, probably, in preventing the committee increasing this amount is the legislative situation. The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization now has under consideration a bill dealing directly with that one question. We hope to present it to the House so that the House can deal directly with that question alone and then we hope that appropriations will be provided for if necessary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to appear before the gentleman's committee and give some facts, because I worked in that service some years ago. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Texas, who is on the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. I shall depend upon that committee getting some action.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IMMIGRATION STATIONS

For remodeling, repairing (including repairs to the ferry boat, Ellis Island), renovating buildings, and purchase of equipment, $257,000, of which $207,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, that principle, though universal, is not applied to Government service, and particularly is this true in the Immigration Service. There seems to be a lack of proper public appreciation as to the importance of the Immigration Service, and this probably is largely responsible for the low standard of compensation. The Immigration Service has almost always paid for itself. The income last fiscal year was a little over four million; the expenditures for maintaining this service was a little over five million. In some years it has paid its own way. It may be news to some of our citizens to learn the cost of immigration enforcement of the all-important immigration laws has for years been practically defrayed from the collection of alien head taxes, steamship fines, and bond forfeitures, and so forth. See how different it is, for exempli gratia, in the prohibition service where the employees are much better paid and where the net loss to the people is in a stupendous amount.

From the annual immigration appropriation there must be defrayed the enormous expense of detaining and deporting 12,000 aliens annually. I am informed that out of this same appropriation must come the salaries of the employees in the United States as well as in Europe. The amount of this appropriation is fixed. Thus the larger the number of deportees the less there is left for salaries. In other words, the greater the efforts of the immigration employees in enforcing the law the smaller become their opportunities of obtaining better compensation. In the past there have been recurring shortages of funds due to great expense in deporting aliens. Such shortages have caused periodical furloughs without pay for many immigration employees. Thus vigilance in detecting unlawful entrants works against their hope of adequate salaries, unless the American public, through Congress, is awakened to the justice of the plea for better treatment.

The immigration inspector has a difficult task to perform. He is not dealing with cargo or customs duties. He handles human freight. He must be gentle but firm and at all times tactful. Much depends upon his ability to espy and weed out the undesirable. It is not a question of liberal or restricted immigration. The immigration act of 1924 presents many problems that can only be solved by an intelligent and resourceful immigration service. But woefully low salaries and intelligence do not come together.

The Secretary of Labor, in his report for fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, quotes the words of President Coolidge in a presidential message, as follows:

> In the industries the condition of the wage earner has steadily improved. The 12-hour day is almost unknown. Skilled labor is well compensated. But there are unfortunately a multitude of workers who have not yet come to share in the general prosperity of the Nation. Both the public authorities and private enterprise should be solicitous to advance the welfare of this class.

Surely we can not ask private enterprise to be fair to labor unless the Government sets the example.

Many of the officers who board vessels or trains at the border or who are stationed at international bridges or ferry landings are required to work for long stretches to accommodate the traveling public.

Twelve-hour stretches of work are not unusual for immigration inspectors. No extra compensation is provided for overtime work. They are precluded from receiving any pay from the transportation companies who are benefited. Customs employees are permitted to receive extra compensation from the steamship companies for work performed on Sundays, holidays, and after hours. Not so the immigration employees.

The best safeguard against venality in Government service is proper compensation, yet for years a short-sighted policy of economy has refused to set up that safeguard. To the credit of the employees of the Immigration Service be it said that their individual integrity, despite great temptations, ranks as high as any branch of the Federal service.

The low standard of compensation is not limited to the inspectional forces. Clerks performing duties similar to those of court stenographers are given salaries lower than that obtained for ordinary routine clerical work. Guards and matrons, responsible for the safekeeping or delivery to destination of many dangerous aliens, receive an average salary of $25 a week. Even laborers receive smaller compensation than that given to men performing the same kind of work in other departments. Out of the salaries of all the employees comes the 3½ per cent which must be contributed to the pension fund.

The Monthly Labor Review, published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, gives some interesting figures on the changes in the cost of living and in the purchasing power of the dollar in recent years. While these changes are quite familiar to everybody, except, apparently, those responsible for the fixing of clerical salaries, I wish to invite your attention to them in order to emphasize the injustice of the situation. According to the latest issue of the above publication, the purchasing power of a dollar, compared with its value in 1913, is 0.687 applied to food and 0.585 applied to clothing. The average purchasing power for all commodities is 0.692 of the 1913 value.

In 1913 the average salary of clerks in the Immigration Service at the port of New York was $1,147.59. Applying the above index number of 0.692 to the present average salary of $1,587.29 it shrinks to $1,098.40, or $49.19 less than the average salary in 1913—a reduction of about 5 per cent. The important item of housing, which is not included in the above figures, constitutes from one-fourth to one-third of the average family budget and is practically double what it was in 1913. When we include that item the reduction in the average salary is far more than 5 per cent.

The older employees are the worst sufferers from this condition because of the glaring lack of a definite policy of promotions. Of approximately 100 clerks at the New York station alone, only one has received an increase in salary since March 1, 1925, and the majority have not received promotions for a much longer period. One-third of the present clerical force at that station are now receiving the entrance salary—$1,320 for clerks and clerk-typists, $1,440 for stenographers—despite the fact that many of them have been in the service three years or more. Most of the older clerks, who are doing important and exacting work, have received no promotions in from four to seven years. The conditions at the New York stations are typical of those prevailing throughout the service.

It is rather incongruous that this condition should prevail in the Labor Department, which was chiefly organized for the welfare of the wage earner. Responsible heads in the Department of Labor, however, realize the inadequate salaries, and, I am sure, are willing to help increase them. But Congress is the only tribunal to give relief. Be it remembered that the zeal to practice economy by the President, the Bureau of the Budget, and Appropriations Committees might, indeed, be praiseworthy, but even that virtue can be overdone and may easily become a vice.

Like my colleague from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] I propose to offer an amendment to H. R. 8269, making appropriations for the Department of Labor, by increasing appropriations by the sum of $200,000 to be used to increase salaries for the immigration personnel. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] that the Immigration Committee will soon report a special bill dealing directly with this question, I have withdrawn my amendment and hope I shall have an opportunity to appear before the committee to plead the cause of these men.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in charge of the bill, or of the chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. It is my understanding that we provided in our immigration laws for the admission of about 150,000 immigrants a year. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that a very much larger number comes into the country, in one instance 300,000 and in another instance 500,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The law if carried out properly permits about 162,000 to come from European countries, and there are certain exemptions. The number actually coming each year is about a half million and the number going out is about 250,000. There is a net of 250,000, of which 45 per cent are from Canada and Mexico.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses: For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Labor, of officers, clerks, and employees appointed, for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Bureau of Naturalization, provided for by the act approved June 29, 1906, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L. 736), and May 9, 1918 (40 Stat. L. 542–548, inclusive), including not to exceed $68,940 for personal services in the District of Columbia, of which amount $10,000 shall be available only for compensation of temporary employees, in accordance with the classification act of 1923; traveling expenses, including not to exceed $400 for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the naturalization of aliens when incurred on the written authority of the Secretary of Labor; street-car fare, telegrams, verifications of legal papers, telephone service in offices outside of the District of Columbia; necessary supplies and equipment for the Naturalization Service; not to exceed $25,000 for rent of offices outside of the District of Columbia where suitable quarters can not be obtained in public buildings; carrying into effect section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. L. 600), as amended by the act approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. L. 765), and in accordance with the provisions of the sundry civil act of June 12, 1917; and for mileage and fees to witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the United States, the expenditures from this appropriation shall be made in the manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe, $680,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the compensation of assistants to clerks of United States courts.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In the general debate on the pending bill there was some discussion of the border patrol system. This new arm of the service is doing a good work along the boundary that separates my district from the Dominion of Canada. The personnel is excellent. The men are intelligent, alert, able, and are giving to their Government all that is in them.

The force consisting of a chief inspector and 13 inspectors cover a territory from Maine eastward to Lake Champlain and down the lake for 50 miles.

They have a difficult situation with which to deal. In the territory covered 125 roads cross the border, not counting many wood roads that are passable. There are many roads passing every port of entry connecting up with the main arteries of travel by crossroads through sparsely settled communities. Take the situation at North Troy as an illustration. The customs office and immigration station is located on the main highway from the north. But within a distance of 2 miles six other roads also enter the States. At Derby Line there are six roads within a distance of a little over 2 miles. The same condition exists at nearly every station in my district.

Automobile travel has made the problem of preventing the entrance of the alien more difficult. At North Troy, a small border town, 3,593 persons arriving by train and 193,944 by auto were examined by the regular force consisting of an immigration inspector and four customs men in the winter and seven in the summer. At Derby Line, another small town, 10,663 persons arriving by train and 218,352 by auto were examined. Over 400,000 persons going into and coming out of Canada passed that station last year. In all, 997,137 entered by railway and highway last year at the stations of Richford and east to New Hampshire. The work of examination was handled by a force of 18 inspectors and 14 border patrol.

Our border patrol in 1926 covered 82,859 miles (62,916 by motor, 2 by boat, 1,823 on foot, 18,116 by rail). Eight hundred and fifty-three freight trains, 4,916 passenger trains, 14,431 automobiles, 61 busses, and 165 other conveyances were examined. Thirty-nine thousand and eighteen people were questioned, 52 independent investigations made, 18 smugglers and 125 smuggled aliens were captured, 188 persons were turned over to immigrant inspectors for further action, 30 automobiles valued at $14,350, and contraband goods valued at $4,513.45 were captured. That was a good year's work for that faithful band of men.

In order to cover the work required by the immigration laws, the 18 inspectors had to work many hours of overtime. At none of the ports was a 24-hour service maintained. For that reason there was nothing to prevent aliens from entering during the hours of the day or night when inspectors were obliged to be off duty for rest.

The aliens are coming in without right. Hundreds of them come over our northern border every year and adding to the million or more who are already here unlawfully. The flow can not be stopped unless a sufficient appropriation is made to provide practically a 24-hour service on every highway leading from Canada. Good work is being done with the force at hand, but we ought to be honest with ourselves and honest with the country and provide a sum sufficient to enforce the law and give it effect.

Our immigration officials are lacking equipment, furniture, and supplies. Filing cabinets, transfer cases, even chairs and desks, are needed. A better type of automobile should be provided to cope with the high-powered cars of the smugglers. Time and time again, when requisitions are made, the officials are informed that the appropriation is insufficient to provide for their purchase. The Government has never provided sufficient funds for the regular service or for the border patrol along the northern border of Vermont.

Another thing I wish to call to your attention. The Customs Service and the Immigration Service are not well housed. At Derby Line, where 400,000 people pass every year, until two years ago the necessary examinations were made on the piazza of a country hotel. I succeeded in interesting some public-spirited citizens, who saw the shame of this great and rich country doing its business in that way, in the acquiring for the services of respectable quarters at a low rental. At North Troy, where more than 200,000 pass every year, a room 10 by 15 in one end of a railway station served as an office where five men worked in the winter and eight in the summer. It was also used for the detention of immigrants and for the storage of captured liquor. There, too, public-spirited citizens had to come to the rescue of the Government, and as a result a building has been erected for the transaction of the business of the Government. I look ahead with hope to a day when the United States will erect at the border a uniform type of a building for the Customs and the Immigration Services that will be a credit to us.

We in Vermont are interested in the enforcement of the immigration law. Our able Senator, than whom no better ever served a people, the late William P. Dillingham, gave of his energy and time to the enactment of sane legislation. A constituent of mine, Hon. W. W. Husband, Assistant Secretary of Labor, one of the best-informed men in the world on immigration matters, is ably assisting in the enforcement of the present act. So we are anxiously looking ahead to the time when efforcement will not be hampered for lack of funds.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the House that an amendment is coming over from the Bureau of the Budget respecting the airway. Members will recall that a few days ago I said that I thought that the amount that we were appropriating is not sufficient, and it has turned out so; and there will be an amendment, which we will offer at the proper time in the Senate. I want the House to understand that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I fully concur in that statement. The whole committee were under the impression that probably that amount would have to be increased. I understand that the increase carried in the supplemental estimate will be about $325,000, which it is hoped will care fully for the lighted-airway program for the fiscal year 1929.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Inasmuch as that amendment is not here, would not the gentleman like to move that the committee rise to-night and meet to-morrow? I would like to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy. I do this because the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has an important motion to recommit which he wishes to make, which ought not to be taken up until to-morrow morning.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they presented to the President of the United States for his approval a bill of the House of the following title:

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 11, 1928, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, grant to each and all of us to be so true to our high calling here on earth that we may serve Thee with joy and without fear; that when each in his own appointed time shall be summoned to join the great company of departed souls we may pass hence in peace, looking humbly for that fuller light which shall break upon us, when the morning is come upon the unseen shore. Grant this O Lord for His sake, who is our life and in whose presence is fullness of joy, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the Live Stock Markets, a paper published by the John Clay Commission Co., of Chicago, and others, of our central markets. This paper contains an editorial entitled "Breakers ahead," and sounding a timely warning against the importation into this country of any livestock or livestock products from those countries that are known to be infested with foot-and-mouth disease.

The editorial is written in strong, concise, and most convincing language. The writer, Mr. John Clay, is one of the really great authorities on the livestock industry of the Nation. He has been for nearly 50 years a successful producer, on a large scale, of both cattle and sheep on the western plains and in the Rocky Mountain territory. For nearly 40 years he has been at the head of one of the great livestock commission companies, with houses located in practically every one of our largest market centers. In addition to these activities, he has been for many years, and is now, at the head of and a directing force in a number of our western banking institutions and has rendered great service in furnishing funds for the rehabilitation of the livestock industry following its recent period of severe depression.

In addition to his intimate knowledge of the industry in this country, Mr. Clay, as a boy in Scotland, and since in frequent visits to his native land, has had unusual opportunities to observe the ravages of the foot-and-mouth disease in its effect upon livestock. Because of such intimate knowledge, his warning is entitled to special consideration at this time.

Without doubt the country will approve to the fullest extent the sentiment expressed in this editorial because of the Nation's recent experiences with this dread disease. In the outbreak of 1914–15, 172,222 animals were destroyed, with an appraised value of $5,865,720. There was expended in eradicating this outbreak, including the value of the animals slaughtered, the expense of their burial, supplies, and work of disinfection, approximately $9,000,000. In the more recent outbreak of 1924–25 the figures show 142,152 animals destroyed, appraised value $4,919,538.86, and the amount expended $7,434,908.22. In each instance one-half the expense was born by the Federal Government and one-half by the States involved.

It will be recalled that less than two years ago the President, in one of his messages to Congress, called attention to the unusually adverse conditions prevailing in our livestock industry, and pointed out the necessity of rendering such consistent aid as could be given toward its rehabilitation. Very recently there has seemed to be some improvement in the unhappy condition of this industry, and in the face of such upward trend it would be especially inopportune to invite another disaster such as infection in our herds and flocks would surely mean.

Because of its extreme importance at this juncture I ask to have the editorial inserted in the RECORD, and I earnestly commend it to the attention of every Member of this body who is interested in the protection and preservation of the herds and flocks of the Nation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

There is evidently a quiet movement going on in Government circles to let in Argentine beef to the United States. Conversations being had in Washington, D. C., are paving the way for what may turn out to be a national catastrophe. The Argentine is full of foot-and-mouth disease. No effort is made to stamp it out. We know what happened to us in 1914–15. Our authorities, both National and State, went at it vigorously and stamped it out.

Foot and mouth is most deadly in the case of pregnant animals. There the death loss is considerable, more especially among ewes and sows. When I was a young farmer in Scotland we paid little attention to this disease. If by chance it visited your farm and attacked your feeding cattle or your wethers on turnips and grain, it put them back a month or more. If it got into your ewe flock at lambing, that spelt disaster.

It is a most insidious disease. It comes out of the sky. Great Britain has it most of the time. It pops up in unexpected places. Hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling have been poured into stamping it out, but it breaks out, and only a day or two ago I noticed where a half dozen herds and flocks in one neighborhood were affected. And yet no live animals—cattle, sheep, or hogs—are allowed into Great Britain except under a very strict quarantine. The supposition is that it reached that country through straw used for packing, or from people coming from an infected zone. In fact, science has failed to find the source of the disease.

Now, if we allow Argentine cattle into this country, dead or alive, we are pretty certain to get the disease. When it comes, as come it will, it may be handled promptly and squelched, but safety first. The real story of the ravages of this disease is told in Great Britain. It wanders through English counties, up and down Scottish vales. What would happen if it got among the big herds of Texas? Fancy the Matador herd going into trenches and ruthlessly killed, as we had to do 12 or 13 years ago in Illinois.

And yet knowing all this Washington is silently conversing on the subject of reinstating the entrance of this Argentine beef to our country. The red signal of danger does not stop them.

They are riding for a fall. The country must rise in its might and stop the desecration of our farms and ranches, the ruin of our already severely taxed property holders.

For seven years we have faced the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune." Are we to face another catastrophe which will in the end affect the whole Nation: First, the livestock men; second, the bankers; and, third, the community at large?

JOHN CLAY.

The following paragraph from the North British Agriculturist, Edinburgh, emphasizes the virulency of this disease:

THE ELUSIVE VIRUS

"Details as to the length of time the virus of foot and mouth can be effective were given recently by Mr. F. C. Minnett, of the Institute of Animal Pathology, in London. In 1926 evidence proved that the disease was carried into this country (England) through the medium of fresh pig carcasses from the Continent. Experiments had proved that in the bone marrow of chilled and salted carcasses the virus survived at least 42 days, and in the bone marrow of frozen beef carcasses for at least 76 days. The virus had been proved to be highly resistant to destruction by carbolic acid, lysol, and certain coal-tar disinfectants. Experiments pointed to formalin being a reliable agent for general disinfection, such as the outside of ricks or contaminated animal hides. Mr. A. Arkwright, of the Lister Institute, said that all attempts to propagate the virus had failed, the virus having been observed to multiply only on the living tissues of animals."

THE RADIO SITUATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on last Monday the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presented for printing in the RECORD a letter from the Technical Radio Laboratory at Newark, N. J. I have here a reply to this letter from the radio commissioner from the first zone, Commissioner Caldwell. I ask unanimous consent that, without reading, it may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

FEDERAL RADIO COMMISSION,
Washington.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: Noting the letter from Mr. D. W. May, of radio station WTRL, Midland Park, N. J., on page 1157 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Monday, January 9, 1928, commenting on the general radio situation and on his experiences with the Federal Radio Commission, it occurs to me that you and other Members of the Senate may wish to know more of the exact status and facts concerning station WTRL and the reasons why, in the public interest, the demands of its management could not be acceded to by the radio commission.

Station WTRL came on the air with 15 watts power on December 17, 1926. This was during the breakdown of the radio law and at a time when the former radio authorities had warned all stations that thus to come on, or to change wave length or power, would speedily wreck the former orderly radio system. Nevertheless, WTRL started up and "pirated" channel 1,070 kilocycles.

On June 15, 1927, after the Radio Commission had completed elaborate studies and designed a new reallocation of all broadcasting stations to bring about order in the air once more and to eliminate the interference and chaos created by the outlaw stations, station WTRL was assigned by the commission to 1,450 kilocycles, continuing with its original 15 watts power.

Station WTRL's opposition to the Radio Commission since that date has grown out of its efforts to secure a preferable wave length; that is, a wave length more comparable to that which the station appropriated for itself when there was no law. The commission would certainly have liked to have given Mr. May such a desirable channel for WTRL, but, unfortunately, all the channels were full, and there were 48 stations to be taken care of in the congested New York City area, in which WTRL is located, and 45 of these stations had come on the air before WTRL.

WTRL was therefore continued licensed by the commission to operate on 1,450 kilocycles, with its original power of 15 watts. This channel, far from being undesirable, as was formerly supposed by many, is now in the midst of a group of assignments of 5,000, 10,000, and even 50,000 watt (ultimate) stations, which have chosen this wave-length region because of its greater distance-carrying power.

Although station WTRL has been licensed continuously since it opened, there seems to be considerable question whether it has ever sent out regular or consistent programs, or even any programs at all.

The radio division of the Department of Commerce reports that its New York radio inspectors, who daily and nightly measure the transmissions of local New York and New Jersey stations, have never once been able to find WTRL on the air.

Also, since December 1, 1927, requests by the commission to the station for newspaper clippings listing its programs during recent weeks have brought no response, and as a result no copies whatever of its programs are in the files of the commission, as in the case of other stations.

Yet this is the station without any record of any public service whatever, or even of operation, which Mr. May demanded to have increased from 15 watts to 1,000 watts, over the heads of some thirty other local stations, all older, and to have assigned to channel 770 kilocycles, a channel used by a popular group of Chicago stations, transmitting independent programs.

To have acceded to Mr. May's demands would have worked a rank injustice to hundreds of other and older stations, situated throughout the country, which are similarly requesting power increases. Furthermore, such an assignment of WTRL (1,000 watts on 770 kilocycles) would have produced a whistle or heterodyne on the Chicago station's program over the entire United States, outside of a 25-mile radius around Chicago, thus denying that Chicago station's program to a population of some 60,000,000, who could have heard only a loud whistle on that channel had Mr. May been permitted to increase his power and go on it.

Incidentally it should be mentioned that the Chicago stations on 770 kilocycles protected in this way by the refusal of the New York commissioner to approve Mr. May's application is connected with no "chain" or network, but operates independent programs. This Chicago station's unduplicated programs are therefore of particular interest to distant listeners throughout the entire central part of the country.

Besides being offered a public hearing on his application for 770 kilocycles (which Mr. May refused, as the correspondence in the commission's files clearly shows) the whole foregoing interference situation which would follow upon increase of WTRL's power was repeatedly explained to Mr. May and to this attorney, Mr. Green, at a series of four or five conferences at New York City, each conference requested by Mr. May in order to save him the trips to Washington. In fact, probably more time has been spent by the New York commissioner and former Secretary Pickard in trying to aid Mr. May, while doing justice to other small stations, than with any other broadcaster. Mr. May's response to such a helpful attitude on the part of the radio commissioners is manifested by the unfair and incorrect statements contained in his letter.

This Mr. May, of WTRL, is the same D. W. May who has figured in a number of radio-station transfers and deals in the New York area. His latest transaction of the kind, prior to WTRL, was the starting and sale of the 500-watt WDWM (the call letters standing for his initials), which also he put on the air during the breakdown of the law on November 22, 1926, against the urging of the authorities, and as a result causing serious interference with local and distant stations.

In this case also Mr. May felt that despite the newness of WDWM and its position of forty-third in the local field of 48 stations, he should be allowed to retain the preferable wave length which he had pirated for WDWM during the law's breakdown.

After preliminary discussions with me as commissioner for his zone, during which lengthy discussions I made particular effort to be helpful to Mr. May, but not at the expense of stations that had remained faithful to the public and to radio by keeping on their prescribed channels, Mr. May demanded a public hearing of his case before the whole commission. This hearing was immediately granted and was conducted by Commissioner E. O. Sykes, former presiding justice of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, sitting with three other original members of the Radio Commission, Admiral Bullard, Doctor Bellows, and myself. Copies of the proceedings of that hearing, occupying 147 typewritten pages, are on file at the commission's offices and can be examined by anyone interested.

After hearing and considering testimony by Mr. May, and by others who appeared against him, the entire commission unanimously denied WDWM's application to resume its former pirated wave length and ordered WDWM to remain on the lower wave length assigned it by the commission.

A week or two later Mr. May telephoned me requesting an appointment in New York to save him coming to Washington, in order to discuss a plan for moving out of the congested metropolitan area to Asbury Park, N. J., and I gladly assisted him in finding a wave length which would be available for use 50 miles from New York City. Later he told me he had sold his station WDWM to the city of Asbury Park, had made "a good thing out of it," and was very much pleased, thanking me for my help. That is the story of Mr. May's WDWM.

Regardless of Mr. May's expressed fears for the safety of the small broadcaster in his letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a recital of the foregoing will indicate that the wave lengths and powers accorded Mr. May's two stations have been fairly and justly in accordance with the service records of those two stations, in comparison with the records of the 680 broadcasters who have been rendering public service long before Mr. May's station started out during the law's breakdown.

With respect to independent broadcasters, the attitude of the commission has always been particularly sympathetic toward the small stations and the independent operators, who make up by far the greatest number of the 680 stations on the air. Indeed, the small stations which are doing a good job in their communities have been given every possible advantage, and where such stations are in isolated regions, increases in power have been authorized for them up to the very limits of interference elsewhere. Unfortunately, however, as is generally known, we have not half enough channels to permit good service by our 680 stations. Nevertheless, the commissioners have struggled days, nights, and week ends with the problem of fitting in these small, independent stations by every ingenuity, so that all worth-while broadcasters might continue on their places on the air.

In his letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Mr. May further expresses great fear that the commission is assigning choice channels to some particular stations. If Mr. May is as familiar with the radio situation as is the average listener, he certainly knows that all of the 65 chain stations which he mentions are, with two or three exceptions, independently owned or controlled, and that these independent stations merely purchased their few hours of daily chain programs from a common purveyor of chain programs, known as a "chain service."

The manifest independence of the principal chain stations is evident upon reading over the accompanying list of the principal chain stations, taken at random:

The Courier Journal Co. and Louisville Times, WHAS, Louisville, Ky.
The Detroit News, WWJ, Detroit, Mich.
The Chicago Tribune, WLIB–WGN, Chicago, Ill.
Travelers Insurance Co., WTIC, Hartford, Conn.
Lit Bros. Department Store, WLIT, Philadelphia, Pa.
Congress Square Hotel Co., WCSH, Portland, Me.
Kaufman & Baer Co., WCAE, Pittsburgh, Pa.
United States Playing Card Co., WSAI, Cincinnati, Ohio.
Atlanta Journal Co., WSB, Atlanta, Ga.
Bankers Life Co., WHO, Des Moines, Iowa.
The Outlet Co., WJAR, Providence, R. I.
Worcester Telegram, WTAG, Worcester, Mass.
Pulitzer Publishing Co., KSD, St. Louis, Mo.
Palmer School of Chiropractic, WOC, Davenport, Iowa.
Washburn-Crosby Co., WCCO, Minneapolis, Minn.
Kansas City Star Co., WDAF, Kansas City, Mo.
National Life and Accident Co. (Inc.), WSM, Nashville, Tenn.
Memphis Commercial Appeal (Inc.), WMC, Memphis, Tenn.

The commission makes no apology for the stations which it has placed on the "distance" channels from 600–1,000 kilocycles. These stations, nearly all of them independently owned and operated, are distinctly the most popular stations in their respective communities, for they are invariably the stations having the best apparatus, the broadest programs, and the widest interest and the best individual records of faithful observance of radio's rules of the air.

They have been assigned preferred positions because of their individual local history and standings as stations, and not because of "chain" or other connections. In fact, some 20 of these stations had no chain service when given their present assignments by the commission, but have since chosen to contract for the program service offered by one of the chains. That they are free to do this is evident, since under the law of 1927 the commission expressly has no authority over programs.

And the supply of two hours of daily programs from a common source of program material certainly has no more relation to the independent character of the station than the supplying of two columns of syndicated news matter to the leading newspapers in 20 cities from a central news bureau would have on the independent control, character, or policy of those papers.

At present the time occupied by these chain programs averages less than two hours per day for each station, making such chain duplication of negligible importance. Later if this purely chain time increases, or as better individual programs are developed by other stations now below 1,000 kilocycles, such stations have, under the commission's procedure of hearings, recourse to contest with the present occupants the right to those "distance" channels. And they will be assigned these channels if it can be shown that such reassignment would, from the standpoint of diversification of programs, be in the greater interest of distant as well as local listeners.

Mr. May's statements declaring that the commission and its members are harsh and intolerant in their actions, and choose to disregard the advice of Members of Congress, are not only denied by the undersigned, but will properly be regarded as absurd by the many Members of both Houses who have repeatedly counseled with the radio commissioners in local and State situations, and who by supplying particular information of the standing of applicants in their communities, public interest rendered, etc., have greatly aided the commission in its handling of the purely radio aspects of such cases.

The members of the Federal Radio Commission invite the most thorough scrutiny of all their actions and operations as an official body during its hectic life of the past 10 months, knowing that all reasonable critics can be answered fully and to their satisfaction on every point which they may raise.

O. H. CALDWELL,
Commissioner, First Zone.

JANUARY 11, 1928.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. DENEEN presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Chicago, Ill., favoring amendment of the so-called Volstead Act so as to permit the sale, manufacture, and transportation of light wines and beers for beverage purposes, and to provide for a referendum vote of the people to establish the sentiment of the majority on the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Murphysboro, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by Commercial Club of Lovell, and the Lions Club and the Shoshone Project Farm Bureau, both of Powell, in the State of Wyoming, protesting against the passage of legislation to further restrict the immigration of Mexican citizens into the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Kenosha, Wis., remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COPELAND presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TYSON presented a resolution adopted by the Southern Appalachian Coal Operators' Association, at Knoxville, Tenn., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTHERN APPALACHIAN COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
Knoxville, Tenn., January 9, 1928.

The Southern Appalachian Coal Operators' Association, at a meeting in the offices of the association, Knoxville, Tenn., on Monday, January 9, 1928, passed, by unanimous vote, the following resolution:

"Whereas the business and industry of our country has been built up by the free play of competition and by freight rates adjusted so that distant points can compete with near-by points; and

"Whereas for the past several years there seems to be growing a sentiment in the Interstate Commerce Commission to base rates entirely on mileage and the commission seems to be expanding its own power to cover all business, as well as that of the railroads, and through the freight rates to zone all materials; and

"Whereas on December 31, 1927, the term of Commissioner John J. Esch expired and the President of the United States sent his name to the United States Senate for reappointment on the commission, and as Mr. Esch has served a six-year term as a member of the commission and was chairman of the commission and was also chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and is, therefore, experienced and his character above reproach, but unfortunately has thrown the weight of his influence and opinion with that portion of the commission which is favoring basing rates on mileage only and the zoning of materials: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Southern Appalachian Coal Operators' Association is opposed to this policy of the commission and opposed to the appointment or reappointment of any man or men whose views lead them to vote in favor of such methods of rate making or policies; and we are, therefore, opposed to the reappointment of Mr. John J. Esch; and we urge that Senators MCKELLAR, TYSON, SACKETT, and BARKLEY not only vote against Mr. Esch's reappointment but use their influence with other Senators to the same end, and in the future oppose on the floor of the Senate this un-American policy: Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the four Senators above mentioned."

R. E. HOWE, Secretary.

COMPARISON OF ELECTRIC RATES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have an article from the publication called Labor, making a comparison of city-owned light plant rates on electricity with privately owned light plants, which I would like to have printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From Labor, January 4, 1928]

TACOMA SHOWING THE WAY—CITY-OWNED POWER AND LIGHT PLANT GIVES SERVICE IN THE HOMES FAR BELOW RATES OF PRIVATE COMPANIES

Labor has received an interesting letter from a good friend and subscriber, Homer T. Bone, who is port counsel of Tacoma, Wash. Tacoma is one of those backward "un-American" cities which goes in for public ownership of its power plant, and here is what Mr. Bone says:

"I enjoyed your editorial of December 17, 'Light bills of two cities,' comparing light rates of Washington City and Ottawa, Canada.

"We in Tacoma indulge in a friendly rivalry with our public-ownership friends in Canada and are always pleased to see the remarkable contrast between the low light rates enjoyed by Canadian cities under public ownership and those exacted from victims of the superior efficiency of private ownership across the line.

LOW RATES IN TACOMA

"Between November 15 and December 15, 1927, I used 686 kilowatt-hours of current in my home for domestic purposes on a lighting circuit. For this service I paid the city of Tacoma $8.75, or a trifle over 1.27 cents per kilowatt-hour.

"During that same period I used 1,563 kilowatt-hours of service in electric heating in my home. For this heating service I paid the city of Tacoma $7.80, or one-half cent per kilowatt-hour.

"It will be seen that I used in this 30-day period in my 10-room home a total of 2,249 kilowatt-hours of electric service for domestic and heating purposes, and for this I paid the city of Tacoma a total of $16.55."

Labor called up "Pepco," the private company which supplies Washington with current, to find out what the same amount of current, used in the same way, would cost in the capital of the United States.

"PEPCO'S" BILL IN WASHINGTON

The system of charges is rather confusing, but the company's expert worked out the charges as follows:

Lighting charge: Three hundred and sixteen kilowatt-hours, at a base rate of 5.9 cents per kilowatt-hour, $18.64; 370 kilowatt-hours, at a charge of 4.5 cents per kilowatt-hour, $16.65. Total charge for 686 kilowatt-hours on lighting circuit, $35.29.

Heating charge: Ten kilowatt-hours, at 5.9 cents per kilowatt-hour, 59 cents; 1,553 kilowatt-hours, at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour, $46.59. Total charge for 1,563 kilowatt-hours on heating circuit, $47.18.

Under public ownership in Tacoma Mr. Bone's lights cost $8.75 per month.

Under private ownership in Washington they would cost $35.29 per month.

Under public ownership in Tacoma his electric heaters cost $7.80 per month.

Under private ownership in Washington they would cost $47.18 per month.

Under public ownership the total charge was $16.55.

Under private ownership the total charge would be $82.47.

TRUST TRIES TO FOOL 'EM

Mr. Bone goes on:

"The municipal power development of Tacoma (owned by the people of Tacoma) will produce about $900,000 net profit for 1927. One can only wonder why the people of Washington permit themselves to be hi-jacked by private monopoly."

Echo answers: "Why?"

The power trust's answer would be: Washington depends on a steam plant, while Tacoma gets its "juice" from water power!

Mr. Bone answers that: "Out in this country publicity artists for the power trust are telling audiences that power can be produced as cheaply in a modern steam plant as from a hydroplant."

In other words, the trust tells one story where it is discouraging water-power development under public ownership and quite another story where it is defending extortionate rates under "private enterprise."

ALLEGED MEXICAN PROPAGANDA

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, from the special committee to investigate alleged payments to United States Senators by representatives of foreign governments, I ask leave to make a partial report (No. 52) and, speaking on a matter of highest privilege, I wish in a few minutes to make an explanation of the proceedings of the committee up to this time. I might say that copies of the report, and copies of the three volumes of the testimony which was taken, and copies of translations of the 71 documents which were produced in the committee, are available in the Chamber, and I have asked that they be placed on the desk of every Senator.

The committee met as soon after its appointment as it was possible to have a full attendance, I think, upon the fifth day after its creation. The first witness summoned was Mr. William R. Hearst, who is the proprietor of a chain of some twenty and odd newspapers which simultaneously published these documents which contained the charges against Senators.

Mr. Hearst laid before the committee 71 documents in the original which he said constituted the entire file that he had on this subject. Some of the 71 documents had been published in facsimile, some in translation, and some had not been published at all. They consisted of 35 letters purporting to have been signed by the President of Mexico, Mr. Calles; of 3 documents purporting to have been signed by the Secretary of the Mexican Treasury; of 7 messages in cipher or code; and of about 25 carbon copies of telegrams or of letters purporting to have passed from one Mexican official to another; some of them written in Mexico, some of them supposed to have been written in New York. The group of papers as a whole came from seven different Mexican Government offices in Mexico City and in New York City, and, according to the initials on the letters, had been typed by upwards of 14 different typists. It was not possible to determine exactly how many, but there were at least 14 typists employed.

Mr. Hearst testified that the first group of these papers had been obtained in Mexico City by his representative, Page, through an American of Mexican ancestry named Avila, who represented that he had bought them from Mexican clerks employed in Mexican Government offices. These papers were taken by Page to New York and submitted to Mr. Hearst in New York City. Hearst testified that he inquired whether every effort had been made to verify their genuineness and that he was assured that it had. He testified that he instructed his representatives to do everything they could to establish the genuineness of the documents.

After the first batch of papers had been produced by this Avila, a second group was obtained by him also in Mexico City. In both cases the only evidence of their origin or their genuineness or the fact that they were bought from Mexican Government clerks was the unsupported word of this Avila. He took money from the Hearst representative, he disappeared with the money, came back with these two groups of papers, and he represented, according to the testimony, that he had given the money to Mexican Government clerks in exchange for these documents. He also represented and testified to us that he saw a ledger sheet taken from the ledger in the office of the controller general of Mexico.

It was further testified that after the submission of the papers to Hearst in New York, Mr. Hearst went to California; that Page and Avila and one other representative of Hearst went to San Antonio; and that when they were there Avila represented to them that two men had come out of Mexico, one of whom was a clerk employed in the office of President Calles, that they had a number of documents sewed up in the interior of a mattress which they brought with them among their belongings; that they wanted $20,000 for these pretended documents which they said they had stolen from President Calles's office. There was no evidence that these men were there or that they brought the documents or that they sold them for money or that they got the money or that they were the source of the documents, except the unsupported word of Avila. He was told by the Hearst representatives that they would not pay over $12,000 for this batch of documents from President Calles's office. He went back, he states, to those Mexicans, offered them the $12,000, and he states they agreed to take it. He also states that they accepted the money, gave him the papers; and that he saw them cut out from the interior of the mattress in which they had been smuggled into the United States. Then he states that as proof of their good will they gave him a second batch of papers in San Antonio without any further charge. These papers also were represented as coming from President Calles's office. So there were four installments of documents, the origin of which depended entirely on the unsupported word of this Avila. He represented that he had paid up to that time out of the Hearst money something like fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars for these papers.

They were all taken to California and shown to Mr. Hearst and to his representatives who were there with him. Then he turned these documents over to some of his editors to handle their publication and their exploitation. They were taken to New York, and one of the editors decided that they ought to check on the genuineness of these papers and on the truth of Avila's story. So, in order to check on Avila's story up to that time, they employed the same man Avila to be "planted," as they called it, in the office of the Mexican consul general in New York City, there to steal what papers he could or buy what he could to corroborate the genuineness of the papers which had been produced.

After five or six weeks Avila did bring to them two instalments of carbon copies of papers which he represented he had purchased from a clerk named Tovias employed in the office of the Mexican consul general in New York; but there again there was no confirmation of his statement, and they had merely the unsupported word of Avila that that was the way he got them and that he had in fact paid the money that he said he had paid for these papers. So much for the origin of the papers.

Mr. Avila was the recipient of the $18,000 in money which he said he paid to the various clerks from whom he got the papers. He also testified that he himself got nothing out of this whole transaction except a $50-a-week salary paid to him by the Hearst newspapers or by Hearst himself.

Mr. Hearst further testified that he did not show or direct to be shown any of these letters to any of the Senators whose names are mentioned in them, and his reason for not directing that to be done, as I recall his words, was that that would mean their premature disclosure, or some such expression as that.

He further testified that he himself made no further effort to establish their genuineness than this. He did testify also that he understood they had been shown to the American Embassy in Mexico City and that some officials of the embassy there had said that they seemed to be genuine. Of course, he himself was not in Mexico and could not answer as to that of his own knowledge.

Then the committee took these papers and set to work on them. I am abbreviating the recital as much as I can in order to try to state merely the substance of what was done. We did not want to employ handwriting experts at high pay to establish any side of this controversy or to prove or disprove the documents, but we wanted, if we could, to get experts who had no money interest in the matter and were not employed to represent any particular side. So we appealed to the Treasury and the Navy Department, each of which has competent experts on that subject, and they were quite ready to assign those experts to us. That was done, and the papers were submitted to them, and those two experts reported that, in their opinion, there was no doubt whatever that all of the signatures were spurious in so far as they were able to compare them with genuine signatures.

We were able to obtain genuine signatures of President Calles with which to check the 35 documents purporting to be signed by him and a genuine signature of the Mexican Secretary of the Treasury; so that 38 out of about 45 of the signed documents were capable of check. We had a treaty, for example, on the files of the State Department which contained President Calles's signature and we were given six letters by Hearst representatives which they said contained the genuine signature of President Calles. Comparing the signatures on the documents with these seven standards of the genuine Calles signatures and the one of L. Montes de Oca, the Secretary of the Mexican Treasury, these two experts said there was no doubt whatever in their minds but the whole bundle were frauds and forgeries.

That conclusion was made known to the counsel of Mr. Hearst, representing him here in Washington; extracts of those opinions of the experts were read to Mr. Hearst's counsel, and they then asked the committee the privilege of having their experts, designated by them, to examine these papers and pronounce for the Hearst organization on their genuineness. The committee gave them that privilege, and turned the documents over to the three Hearst experts. For many days they spent long hours in a careful study of these documents, and finally, at the conclusion of this long study, the three Hearst experts agreed with the two experts selected by the committee that every one of these Calles and L. Montes de Oca papers was a forgery.

If the Senate wants to see their reasons for that I suggest that they refer to the last page of volume 3 of the testimony which lies on the desks of Senators. There is a folded sheet which contrasts three genuine signatures of President Calles with 3 out of the 35 of the forged signatures. The genuine signatures are the odd numbers, Nos. 1, 3, and 5; the spurious signatures are Nos. 2, 4, and 6. It does not require an expert, in our judgment—and I might say that I believe that all I am saying on this subject is the unanimous view of our committee—to pronounce those signatures clumsy forgeries.

For example, in every one of the genuine signatures of President Calles there are five loops or angles in the word "Elias." In every one of the forged signatures there are only four. In every one of the genuine signatures the "i" of the name "Elias" carries its dot or accent. In no one of the spurious signatures does that dot occur.

The difference in the concluding flourish of the name is obvious. The curve is exactly reversed in the spurious signatures.

The shaping of the letters is different. The final "s" of the name "Calles" is always carefully formed in the forged signatures. It is never carefully formed in the genuine signatures; and I could go on for half an hour pointing out these items of difference. Suffice it to say that all the experts and all the members of the committee unhesitatingly pronounced every one of these Calles signatures to be fraudulent.

The committee then devoted itself to a study of the seven "code" messages which were accompanied by their translations, and which purported to show——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there, before he leaves the signatures?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield gladly.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the committee and the experts reach the conclusion that the forged signatures referred to were the work of the same person in all instances?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No. There are two or three signatures of President Calles that are obviously made by a different person from the one who signed the great mass of the Calles documents.

Mr. NORRIS. How many of the forged signatures or documents of the President of Mexico were forged by the same person?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Apparently 32 out of the 35 were forged by the same person. Three were apparently forged by an extremely illiterate person, or some one who wrote like a schoolboy. They were very poor; even poorer imitations than these that we have copied here.

Mr. NORRIS. What were those three?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Those three were carbon copies of what purported to have been letters sent out from his office. All that purported to be the originals of letters signed by President Calles were apparently forged by the same person.

The committee next devoted itself to a study of these "code" messages which were pretended confirmations of messages sent from Calles or from the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Mexico City to the consul general in New York. These confirmations were supposed to have been sent through the diplomatic pouch. Each code message had pinned to it the pretended translation in plain Spanish of the code message, and they purported to show the confirmation of this spending of money and its payment to Senators.

One of the first suspicious things about those confirmations was that one of them, by its date, left Mexico City on the 17th of July, 1926, and was stamped received in New York City by way of the diplomatic pouch on July 20. As there was no air mail between those cities, that was an obvious impossibility. It might have been an error, but it was one of the things that attracted our attention.

Through the courtesy of the Navy Department we were given the assistance of the very efficient code and cipher experts in that section of the Navy Department. They worked all day and all evening for over 10 days on these seven messages. At the end of the 10 days they testified to us that the code messages were a meaningless jumble of letters, not susceptible of being broken down as a code, because it never was a code; that they were made by somebody who tapped away on the left-hand upper corner of the typewriter keyboard and used only eight letters of the typewriter for most of the code words. They said it was not a code at all; that it was mere nonsense; and that it bore no relation whatever to the purported translation in plain Spanish; and Commander Studle, the head of that section, testified that he had no hesitation in pronouncing them all to be fakes.

The committee then set itself to a study of the errors in spelling and in grammar and in punctuation and in accentuation that were apparent in the documents. They were full of errors. Some of them had upward of 100 errors in a single letter, misplaced accents, omitted accents, misspelled words, errors in punctuation, and what not.

If Senators will look at the table which appears at the conclusion of volume 3, on page 294, they will see some of the results of that study. The letters were numbered at the time of their presentation to us by Hearst, and those numbers are used throughout.

In the upper block on that table are given the numbers and the stenographers' initials of the letters coming from the different offices. That shows the offices from which the various letters came. The table in the left-hand column gives a few of the characteristic errors that run through this series. One of them that I myself thought was very significant was a mistake in the abbreviation for the Spanish word that means "you."

In Spanish, as in English, abbreviations usually end with a period. They do in all modern languages. The man who wrote these documents followed the abbreviation "ud." that stood for the word "usted" with a comma. The committee consulted seven different scholars of Spanish, most of them Americans in birth and in allegiance, and most of them did not know that we were consulting the others. They all told us that that error, for example, was an idiosyncrasy that would be very seldom met with. Not one stenographer in a thousand would make such an error as that. It was like abbreviating "Mister" to read "Mr," instead of "Mr." Yet we found, when we came to study the documents, that papers ostensibly coming from seven different Mexican Government officers, from 14 or more stenographers in two cities, all of them, wherever they used that word at all, contained that curious little error, indicating to our minds, when taken in conjunction with all the other errors which are listed here, and still others, that the same person operated the typewriter that made all of these documents. We had no doubt whatever but that that coincidence of error, running throughout these documents—and that is only one of several—showed that the same person had typed them, just as we think the same person had signed 32 out of the 35 forged letters of President Calles.

When we got that far, with the Hearst experts agreeing with our experts in handwriting that these were all a pack of forgeries, with the code experts testifying that the "code" messages were a mere jumble of nonsense, with this very significant coincidence of errors running throughout the documents, it seemed to the committee that we had pretty nearly solved the question of the genuineness of these papers. But we then subpœnaed the officials of all the cable and telegraph companies which carry messages between Mexico and New York. Their copies of cablegrams and telegrams back in 1926 have been destroyed, under the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but some of these telegrams were dated 1927, and no company could find in its files any copy or any record of any of the messages in the year 1927.

Many of the messages in 1926 related to the telegraphic transfer of money. The companies were unable to find—the records of that being still preserved—a record of any transfer of any sum indicated in these telegrams, showing conclusively that no such messages ever passed over the cables or telegraph wires.

The committee then made some inquiries, but did not summon witnesses, because we thought the matter was already sufficiently proved, which tended to corroborate our conclusions.

For example, with the permission of the Mexican consul general we had his bank account in New York examined. There was absolutely nothing there to correspond with these supposed transfers of money to his credit back in 1926. We examined the watermarks of the paper, of course, and we made inquiries of the manufacturers of that kind of paper whether any sales had ever been made to the Government of Mexico. We have not had full reply from one of them; but the other one has made investigation from all of its jobbers, and says that with the exception of a few small lots sold to private printers in Mexico City they have not sold any in Mexico at all. The Government of Mexico never bought paper of that watermark.

Then we found, in this supposed ledger sheet, that Avila said he saw taken from the ledger in the controller general's office, an entry that showed a sale of $30,000 worth of trucks, I believe, or automobiles of some description, by the Buick Motor Co. to the general staff of the President of Mexico. That company was very ready to help us make inquiries; and their representative in Mexico City, their agents in the border towns along the American frontier, their auditors at Flint, Mich., and their officers in New York, all say that to the best of their knowledge and belief no such sale was ever made and no such payment was ever made to them; and they said they thought they would know it if there had been any such sale or any such payment.

The committee did not feel justified in spending either the time or the money to bring in paper dealers from all these borders, or automobile agents from Mexico City and from along the border, nor did it feel justified in subpœnaing the production of the original ledgers of the New York banks, and the coming of all the clerks necessary to prove them. We were all convinced that these papers without exception are fraudulent, spurious, and, in so far as they purport to bear the signature of either President Calles or the Secretary of the Mexican Treasury, they are forgeries. We are further convinced, and so find, as appears in our report, that no Senator of the United States has accepted or has been promised or has been offered one penny of money or any other valuable thing by any official or representative of the Mexican Government; and we state that finding in as plain terms as we are able to make it.

There is not a scintilla of evidence to sustain the allegation or the imputation that any Senator was ever so much as approached in this matter by any representative of Mexico.

Perhaps the Senate will bear with me if I say just a word in conclusion. This is the most flagrant case of the sort that has happened since I have been in the Senate; but, as we all know, over and over again charges of this kind against all of us or any of us are whispered around, and often never reach the light. I dare say that our votes are sold without our knowledge over and over again, and that the people who are disappointed by our votes are only too ready to attribute to us a corrupt motive. It seems to me that this disclosure, this obvious fraud, which has been brought out into the light and shown to all the world to be a fraud, rather points the way for our handling of similar charges in the future, that in justice to ourselves and to one another this kind of thing ought to be made public as soon as we hear it, and that the Senators themselves who are mentioned in such charges as this are entitled to know it, and are not helped by the suppression of such stories, however we may feel certain when we suppress them that there is not a word of truth in them. In other words, I believe that the sooner these things come to the light the sooner their falsity and fraud are shown.

In conclusion I want to say, Mr. President, that we do not ask for the immediate discharge of the committee. We hope that we shall find out who made these forgeries, who typed them, and who signed them, and if we can find that out we would like to be able to report that to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down I would like to ask him a question or two, if he will permit.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Gladly.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, Mr. Hearst, during all of this investigation, was represented before the committee by an attorney?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think at every session.

Mr. NORRIS. Am I correct in drawing the conclusion from what the Senator has said that neither Mr. Hearst nor his attorney made any attempt to have experts of their own examine these signatures and these documents until after Mr. Hearst's attorney had been informed by the committee that the committee's experts had examined them and reached the conclusion that they were all fraudulent?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. My recollection is that I told both of Mr. Heart's lawyers that we had had these examined, and stated what our experts said before they made any suggestion of having their experts examine them.

Mr. NORRIS. So that no attempt was made by Hearst or any of his representatives to have these documents examined by experts, as far as the committee knows, until after they had been informed that the committee had employed experts, and that they had made an examination and reached the conclusion that they were fraudulent?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. So far as I know, that is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator another question; and inasmuch as the committee, from the chairman's statement, have not concluded their labors, I might be asking the Senator to disclose evidence not yet adduced, and if he is not perfectly willing to answer on account of the fact that there may be reasons why he does not want to give the information, if he declines to answer the questions I will not be at all offended. I presume the committee must have reached the conclusion, from the vast amount of forged evidence which has been disclosed, that some of the witnesses orally testifying before the committee have committed perjury?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I can not make it as strong as that. There was a suspicious coincidence between the sample letter which we had Avila write on the typewriter, without warning and the typewriting of these letters in question, but the resemblance was not so great that I should say with conviction that Avila testified falsely. Frankly, I suspect him, but I have not enough evidence to convict him in my own mind.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator about the other representative of Mr. Hearst, by the name of Page. Did his testimony, and the evidence disclosing his activity, show him to have occupied a position beyond and above suspicion?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No. Mr. Page made one statement in answer to questions by Senator ROBINSON and myself that I for one believed to be false. He testified that he had bought or received a letter purporting to have been written by Senator LA FOLLETTE to President Calles; that he got it from a Mexican newspaper man, whose name and appearance he has wholly forgotten, although he remembers meeting him four times in rapid succession in connection with the incident. The letter has nothing to do with this file. It was a letter which was sent up to the Public Ledger and they found it to be an obvious fake. I think—and it is only my opinion—that Page testified falsely when he said he did not remember from whom he got that so-called La Follette letter.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is a lawyer of ability and experience, as everybody knows, and I would like to ask him if, in his judgment, it is not apparent from other evidence known to be true in the case that in all human probability Mr. Page in that respect did commit perjury?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; I can not make it so strong as that.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator conceive of a man in an important matter of that kind, which he himself said was so hot that he could not send it through the mails, getting that kind of a letter connecting up a United States Senator and the President of another country, and then going back to see that man three or four different times——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Four times in all.

Mr. NORRIS. Four times in all. Does the Senator think he would forget who he was and not be able to tell his name or describe him?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not believe it; but I do not believe you could convict him of perjury on my disbelief without any confirmatory evidence.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is unprejudiced, and if the Senator is convinced that the man is guilty of perjury, why would it not follow that other men, including jurymen, would feel the same way? I do not care to go into that, however.

I want to ask the Senator if there were produced in evidence the newspaper articles that were published in the Hearst papers, written by Page and published from day to day, as these forged documents were likewise published? Did the Senator examine those articles written by Mr. Page?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I examined some of them. I do not remember any particular significance in them.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that if you would discard all evidence of every kind except the documents referred to by Page, and the articles written by Page, you would have to reach the conclusion that they were at least unfair and unjust, and that his assertions from day to day were not borne out by the forged documents he was publishing from day to day?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I did not pay much attention to Page's running commentary on these papers. I thought that was relatively unimportant.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be, standing alone; but it might be of considerable importance taken in connection with the other evidence. Page was the man who, prior to his employment by Hearst, in behalf of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, sent the forged letter that is supposed to have been written by a Senator to Calles?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if it did not appear in evidence that Page himself, by a letter written to Senator LA FOLLETTE, admitted over his own signature that what he was sending up to the Ledger, which, at the time he sent it, he said was too hot to go through the ordinary mails, was a forgery? Was not that letter offered in evidence?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am not sure whether it was offered in evidence. It was produced at the hearing. I do not recall whether in that letter Page admits it was a forgery or not, but he admitted it elsewhere. He does not contest the fact at all.

Mr. NORRIS. That occurred before he secured the forged documents in this case from Avila?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. So that he had had some experience, and he had some notice that forged papers in reference to the President of Mexico and a Senator of the United States were in circulation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. He knew that before he got the Hearst papers?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct, and it ought to have put him on warning.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator about the testimony of Mr. Hearst. The Senator has stated that Mr. Hearst testified that he had made diligent search, or words to that effect, to ascertain whether these signatures of the President of Mexico to these documents were genuine.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; I did not mean to say that. Mr. Hearst, so far as I understand it, made no inquiry at all. He says he directed other people to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am corrected; that is the way the Senator stated it. What direction did he make? Did the committee ascertain that?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We found out what was done, and that is what I tried to explain to the Senate. They put Avila to work to corroborate himself.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator reach the conclusion that Mr. Hearst himself, in fact, made no effort to ascertain whether these were genuine or forged documents?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think I would call it an effort to instruct his editors to verify them if they could. The Senator wants me to characterize Hearst's actions in this matter and I am perfectly frank about it and I do not hesitate to do it. I think that in dealing with the reputations of four Senators of the United States and in dealing with such terrible charges against them as these papers contain it was incumbent on Mr. Hearst to exhaust every effort to establish their genuineness before he printed them. I do not think he did exhaust every effort. He turned the matter over to two trusted editors, or managers, whom he employed, and he seems to have left the whole thing to them.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator whether, as a matter of fact, from the evidence, he thinks any real effort was ever made by Hearst or any of his representatives to ascertain whether these were forgeries or not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes. They say they took them to the American Embassy.

Mr. NORRIS. But they do not say that the American Embassy said they were genuine?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They said that the counsellor of the American Embassy glanced at them and said, "They look all right to me," or words to that effect, "They look genuine to me"; but they do not pretend that he made any careful study of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Did they ever submit them to experts or anyone of that kind?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not until after we did.

Mr. NORRIS. As I have read the evidence, and the Senator is more familiar with it than I am, I am unable to find anything that Mr. Hearst ever did except give that general direction to his employees, and one of them was Page——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. One of them was Victor Watson and the other was Coblenz, I think. I forget his first name.

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of fact, they have not done anything except the little things the Senator has narrated, and undoubtedly Hearst knew that they had not done anything. Did he ever make any inquiry, even of those whom he was directing to look the thing up, as to whether they had done anything or not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not recall whether any such inquiry was testified to by anybody. What they did, as I have said, was to put Avila to work to try to steal something from the office in New York to corroborate what he said he got in Mexico. That was all he did, so far as I know.

Mr. NORRIS. If there was some dirty work, Avila had probably done it, and in order to corroborate Avila's dirty work, they employed Avila to do some more dirty work, it seems to me.

I will ask the Senator whether any of the officials of any of the telegraph companies were subpœnaed to get copies of any telegrams which might have passed between Avila and Page, or Hearst and Avila, or Hearst and Page, or any of them?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No; we made no effort to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. You made no effort to do it?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in this connection I desire to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing on Monday in the Washington Daily News, which was taken from the Los Angeles Times of January 6.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE CONFESSIONS OF HEARST"

Amazing as they were, the previous admissions of William Randolph Hearst of his recent reckless irresponsibility in the publication without substantiation of documents purporting to show that Mexico was plotting with other nations against the peace and safety of the United States pale into insignificance beside the confession which he has just caused to be made a part of the record of the Senate committee named to investigate his charges.

Faced with the imminent official declaration by the committee that these documents are wholesale forgeries, proven by overwhelming and irrefutable evidence, the publisher rushed before the committee with testimony of experts, only now hired by himself, to the effect that the "secret Mexican Government records" which he has so long blared to the public as unqualifiedly genuine and authentic, are in fact impudently spurious.

The annals of yellow journalism will be searched in vain for anything remotely approaching a parallel to this performance by Hearst. Beginning about the middle of November and continuing daily for more than a month, the 25 newspapers owned and directed by Hearst published daily under frantic scare heads and in whole pages of large type articles of the most inflammatory character declaring the Hearst papers to be in possession of records taken from the official Mexican archives showing that that country was engaged in sinister plots with Nicaragua, with Japan, and with Russia against the United States and against American interests in general.

Nowhere in these records, embellished with photostatic reproductions of the "records" and exploited in the most sensational fashion possible to Hearst experts in sensationalism, was there the slightest proof of the charges, no hint of any possible doubt as to their authenticity, no suggestion that investigation might disprove them, no opportunity given any of the prominent men accused to deny the allegations against them or defend themselves. On the contrary, the assertion was iterated and reiterated in the Hearst news and editorial columns that the documents were authentic and that they revealed conspiracies of the gravest possible character against the United States.

The climax came when the Hearst papers, on the strength of more "records," accused four United States Senators of being in the secret pay of the Mexican Government in furtherance of those "plots" and published documents to show that the Mexican Government had set aside an enormous sum of bribe money to be paid these Senators in return for their "services."

The United States Senate moved immediately to investigate these growing charges of infamy. A committee of Senators was named to take the evidence and Hearst was invited to submit proof of his charges.

From the beginning of the inquiry the utterly groundless character of the Hearst allegations became daily more apparent. Not a scintilla of evidence was produced from any disinterested source to establish the authenticity of the charges. Called before the committee and questioned with specific regard to his accusations against the four Senators, Hearst himself testified that he had made no investigation of the charges before publishing them in his newspapers, that he had asked none of the four Senators about it or given them any opportunity to be heard, and that he had no evidence indicating that any Senator had received such a bribe, and that he did not believe the charge himself when he published it.

Staggering as was this admission of journalistic depravity, it was still to be outdone by Hearst himself. As the hearing proceeded and evidence piled up of the spurious character of the Hearst documents and their venal source, with no testimony whatever to support their authenticity, the outcome became so obvious as to forewarn the publisher of the impending disaster to himself and his papers through complete and official exposure of his unscrupulous attempt to embroil the United States with friendly nations.

In this desperate situation he took the only course which appeared to him possible to save something of the wreck of his journalistic reputation. He anticipated the inevitable by admitting it himself, thereby hoping for the crumb of mercy accorded to the confessor. He hired handwriting experts who, at his behest, appeared before the committee and testified that the documents were forgeries.

This investigation and confession, by and for Hearst, was made seven weeks after the Hearst papers began publication of the documents and three weeks after the last of them had been printed and the Senate committee had begun its inquiry. This despite the fact that Hearst himself admitted he had had the documents in his possession prior to their publication for a period sufficient to have had them experted by handwriting authorities ten times over. This despite the fact that during their publication their authenticity and the truth of their charges daily had been categorically denied by every official and prominent citizen whom they accused—denials so impressive as to give any honest newspaper publisher, whatever his own faith in the charges, pause in which to recheck and investigate.

It is now proven that not only was there no such recheck and investigation by Hearst papers, but there was never any check or investigation in the first place. The testimony of Hearst himself and of his editors before the Senate committee established that Hearst did not hire his handwriting experts until long after all the forged documents had been published; that at the time this testimony of the publisher and his agents was taken by the committee this experting had not been done nor was ever intended. It was not done, in fact, until Hearst was driven into a corner and forced to any expedient to try to save himself some shred of journalistic ethics.

The complete absence of anything approaching good faith even in this eleventh-hour confession of desperation is shown by the fact that on the morning of the day Hearst's handwriting experts were to appear before the committee Hearst issued signed instructions to the editors of his own newspapers to abandon all attempts to establish the authenticity of the documents—this in the face of the testimony before the committee of some of these editors and of Hearst himself that they "believed" them authentic.

On what such a "belief" could have been predicated does not appear. All the sources which the Hearst experts belatedly used in determining the fraudulence of the documents were available before their publication and with months in which to employ them. Genuine signatures of President Calles and of other Mexican officials were on file in Washington, available for the same comparison by which the Hearst agents now find to be forgeries the purported signatures of the Mexican President on the published documents. The comparisons that showed that letters purporting to have come from half a dozen different Mexican Government departments were all written on the same typewriter could have been made as readily before their publication as afterwards. There is no part of the Hearst inquiry into the genuineness of the documents he exploited which was not as practicable before as after their exploitation.

That Hearst did not want an investigation in advance of publication which would have proved the falsity of the documents and prevented their publication is obvious to the most simple-minded. That he would never have had it made, save as a final and desperate gesture of "good faith" in his extremity, is equally apparent. To those familiar with his long record of personal and journalistic animosity against Mexico and Japan and his methods of satisfying his grudges, his real motives need no explanation. That he deliberately imperiled the friendly relations of the United States with other nations with blatantly exploited uninvestigated charges of the gravest nature meant nothing to him.

It is a black record, the blackest in American journalism, the most gross abuse of the right of a free press in this or any other country's history. To call his proven fakes inflammatory is to understate their tenor. They accused a neighbor country of repeated acts of war; accused Japan of plotting against the peace of the United States; they accused the United States Senators of treason; they accused dozens of high and reputed officials and prominent citizens of the blackest of crimes against patriotism; all without investigation, equivalent, or mitigation.

Now, he appears, and facing the consequences of his wanton efforts to deceive the public and to force a grave international crisis, Hearst says he is sorry but there does not appear to have been any basis for his charges after all.

The new California plea of "not guilty because of insanity" seems to be the only one he can make under the circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not intend at this point to attempt a discussion of the evidence which the select committee of the Senate has taken and reported to the Senate. I concur and all members of the committee concur in the report. My purpose now is to give emphasis to the statement of the chairman of the committee that there is no contradiction in the evidence upon the main conclusion that the documents are forgeries.

While I have no authority to speak for Mr. Hearst or for anyone who represents him, and do not assume to do so, I am convinced that Mr. Hearst himself and everyone who appeared before the committee representing him now feels assured that the documents, which it is said were obtained from the files of the Mexican Government in the City of Mexico and from the files of the Mexican consulate in the city of New York, are in fact clearly forged and not genuine.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked the chairman of the committee a question as to whether Mr. Hearst or his representatives exercised precaution to determine their genuineness before publishing the documents. I think a fair construction of the record discloses beyond a shadow of a doubt that while Mr. Hearst believed the documents to be genuine there was no such investigation made of them as their nature and the purpose to publish them if genuine required. I think the natural course to have pursued in connection with the documents, taking into consideration the facts and circumstances under which it was claimed they had been procured, was to submit them to men of experience in determining the genuineness of documents; and if that precaution had been taken, they would never have been published and this investigation would never have been made necessary.

I wish to emphasize, and I want the country as well as the Senate to know, that when a proper study of the documents was made it became clear beyond the shadow of a doubt that they were forgeries. If anyone will take the trouble to read the record, the conclusion will be reached that not only are they forgeries but that the forgeries were poorly executed.

I do not intend now to characterize the practice which has become too common in American newspapers and in some American magazines of recklessly assailing the integrity of men in public positions. This ought to be a lesson to those who quickly lend their ears to rumors assailing the character of men in office who do not agree with them. Such incidents as this are discreditable to any publicity agency.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on next Wednesday morning, January 18, following the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate upon the subject of the Hearst scandal.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have had called to my attention by the financial clerk the statute which we passed which provides that in all investigations ordered by the Senate the expenses of which are to be paid out of the contingent funds, there shall be a limitation in the resolution authorizing the investigation. In the resolution providing for a renewal of the investigation of the naval oil reserve leases and extending the original resolution there is no such limitation, and the original resolution which passed before the law to which I have referred was enacted. Therefore, in order to comply with that technicality, I ask unanimous consent to submit and have referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution providing a limitation on the expenditure which may be incurred.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to have the resolution acted on at this time?
Mr. NORRIS. It will first have to go to the committee and be reported, but the committee have seen it and are ready to report it back, so it might just as well be read now.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.
The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 108), as follows:

Resolved, That the cost of continued and renewed investigation authorized by Senate Resolution No. 101, agreed to January 9, 1928, shall not exceed $25,000.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably without amendment the resolution which has just been read, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?
There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

PENAL CODE OF THE CANAL ZONE

On motion of Mr. WALSH of Montana, the bill (S. 1256) to amend the penal code of the Canal Zone was taken from the calendar and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

SOME RAILROAD HISTORY

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have here an editorial from the Belton (S. C.) News in reference to "A little bit of railroad history," which I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.
The editorial is as follows:

Two weeks ago we published on the front page in the first column and a half free of all charge the carefully prepared statement of the general counsel and first vice president, Mr. L. E. Jeffries, giving it the most prominent position in our paper.
The statement was brought to us by special messenger, who stated that it had been approved by the president of the Southern Railway Co., Mr. Fairfax Harrison, and that President Harrison had sent him to us with it.
We understand that these two officials of the Southern Railway Co. are paid something like $50,000 per year salary by that railroad corporation, as experts learned in the law, the history of transportation, and otherwise thoroughly familiar with the entire railroad "complex," historically, theoretically, and practically.
The first and opening sentence, like every other sentence in that carefully studied and subtly concocted statement, is a tissue of falsification of railroad history in this State, and a frightful, slanderous defamation on South Carolina and her great sons, like Robert Y. Hayne, E. L. Miller, Rene Goddard, Colonel Cross, David Ernst, George McDuffie, John C. Calhoun, and all those great South Carolinians, who, in the days of the internal improvements craze of the eighteen hundred and twenties and eighteen hundred and thirties opposed the wild turnpike, plank roads, and canal schemes that simply wrecked other States, and stood out against all such projects and fought for and started steam railroad building here.

The opening sentences of the statement declares: "There were few, if any, railroads in the State of South Carolina in the eighteen thirties and eighteen forties. * * * The legislature was endeavoring to induce capital to invest its money in the State," etc. That is pure, unadulterated fiction, and for a subtle purpose. That is a slander that South Carolina newspapers should refute instead of publish and commend. The historical facts are that as early as 1821 Robert Y. Hayne advocated in the press of the State and in public speeches the building of steam railroads as the and the only solution of not only our State's but the Nation's needs, and bitterly assailed from time to time the wasting of money upon turnpikes, plank roads, canals, and the like, with the result that in 1832 South Carolina had the longest-operated steam railroad in the world, as our legislature had incorporated January 30, 1828, the Charleston & Hamburg (Augusta) Railroad Co., that gave South Carolina not only the longest steam railroad in operation but also the first railroad in the United States using steam locomotive power from the beginning.

In 1830, when there were only 23 miles of railroad in the United States, more than 12 miles of this one steam railroad in South Carolina was in operation, carrying freight, passengers, and the United States Government Post Office files show it was the first steam railroad to carry the United States mails. The road was built entirely by South Carolinians with capital and money raised in this State, and what is more, one of the engines, the "Best Friend," was the first steam locomotive ever built in the United States and was designed and assembled by Mr. E. L. Miller, of Charleston, S. C. The event of the completion of the Charleston & Hamburg Railroad to (Augusta) Hamburg, 136 miles in length, is referred to in May, 1833, in the Charleston Mercury in part as follows:

"The Charleston & Hamburg Railroad is the greatest extent of steam railway line in consecutive miles in any part of the world."

And yet modern Munchausens, like the authors of the Southern Railway statement we published and that has been more or less published by the newspapers of this State, and who draw down salaries of $50,000 per annum as railroad experts in railroad finance, practical operation, railway science, law, and public service, proceed to tell us that we had no railroads then and try to lead an unsuspecting and confiding public here to believe that we and our legislature induced them to bring their capital and money here to get us to market and to give us the transportation necessary to get us out of the "sticks." And a paper almost at the door of Old St. Michael's Church in Charleston proceeds to commend editorially that defamation on the State of South Carolina, and one of the greatest of Americans, Robert Y. Hayne, who gave his life for railroad promotion, and who and whose generation, when it came to writing the sum total of all this great man did for his State, his Nation, and his fellow men, even after he had been the one Member of the United States Senate, selected by his colleagues as the constitutional lawyer to successfully engage Daniel Webster in that brilliant debate on the expressed, reserved, and compromised powers of the Constitution which it took a war between the States to settle; after he had been the first mayor of Charleston; after he had been a Member of both branches of Congress and our State legislature, serving as speaker of the house in the latter; after he had been attorney general and governor of our State, he wished and his people recorded this on his pedestal now in Old St. Michael's Church as the most important lesson from his most valuable and useful life:

"His last public service was his effort to open direct railroad communication with the vast interior of our continent."

The history of our State and of our country records that Robert Young Hayne was the first man to suggest not only in South Carolina but in the United States, steam railway transportation as the solution of the Nation's need, commercially, economically, socially, and politically. As early as November 22, 1821, the Charleston Gazette published his letter, reading in part: "Mr. Editor, having seen a specimen of a patent railway, I believe the plan would be useful in this State. The season for discussing the great subject of internal improvement has arrived and this may add to the materials."

With this letter the Gazette published the "specimen" or specifications of the "patent railway," proposing not the horse-drawn tramway of Massachusetts, or the sail-horse pulled one of Maryland, or the horse-stationary engine road of Pennsylvania but steam as a locomotive power. Robert Y. Hayne and others continued to advocate steam railroads and oppose canals, plank roads, turnpikes, and the like, with the result that they raised in this State the money and built the Charleston & Hamburg Railroad, 136 miles in length, from Charleston to Hamburg (Augusta), and in 1832 had a comprehensive system of railroads planned and partly built, including a railroad through Spartanburg, Asheville, Knoxville to Cincinnati and Louisville, called the Louisville, Cincinnati & Charleston Railway Co., incorporated in 1832 by our State legislature, and of which Robert Young Hayne was president until his untimely death, in 1839, at the age of 47, in Asheville from overwork as president of this then the longest proposed railway in the world.

Robert Y. Hayne's advocacy of connecting South Carolina with the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys had in view not only winning the West for the Nation but winning it for slavery and the South. He was not merely a railroad promoter or mere railroad builder, big as such men were and overshadow as completely as they do some of these modern overpaid railroad lawyers and officials, who can not see beyond the pocketbook nerves of their bondholders; but he was a statesman with a vision, and he pointed out at a big railroad convention he called, and over which he presided, which was attended in Knoxville by 380 delegates from all parts of the Middle West and the South, and which resulted in Cincinnati and Ohio building, with the help of Kentucky and Tennessee, the railroad now owned by that city and leased by the Southern Railway Co., that not only would such a railroad open up the West to the South and give the West the market needed for its development and prosperity, but it would be the "means of healing the (slavery) breach so deep and wide between the South and the West." If the valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers were linked to the Atlantic Ocean, he argued, by way of Charleston, that vast section of the United State might become friendly to slavery through the "potent influence of understanding."

In his address as presiding chairman he said nothing about slavery, but the approaching war between the States over that unsettled and compromised question in the Constitution of the United States was the "urge" back of the tremendous and successful effort he made to win the delegations for steam railroad transportation when he pictured that a railroad from Charleston to Cincinnati and Louisville would prove a "controlling and permanent influence on the peace and perpetuity of the Union by practically increasing the reciprocal dependence of the North and South, by establishing business, promoting friendships, abolishing prejudices, creating greater uniformity in political opinions, and blending the feeling of distant portions of our country into a Union of heart," as well as of commerce, agriculture, religion, culture, and transportation.

And what a pity it is in these days of the Nation's greatness, when all the world looks to us for example, that there are not at the head of the present great Southern Railway system, made possible by the constructive railroad building, public good will, and statesmanship, patriotism, and foresight of that railroad and nation builder and pioneer, Robert Young Hayne; what a pity there are not now at the head of this great railway system real men like Robert Young Hayne and all those other South Carolinians, who "in the eighteen thirties and eighteen forties" had already built and planned more steam-railway mileage and had more in operation as early as 1832 than there was in the rest of the world, to carry on that splendid work with a decent regard for the people and the public, and devoting their energies and efforts to increasing the efficiency of the great trust they hold, instead of being engaged in pettifoggying, sharp practice, and in blocking road improvement and our industrial progress, maligning the names of real railroad men like Hayne, Miller, Calhoun, and others, and defaming the fair name of this splendid State of South Carolina, which has always been first in any worthy service, whether it be railroad building, character building, or nation building.

Let us repeat, what a pity it is that there are not at the head of the great Southern Railway Co., which would have little mileage were there subtracted from its present 6,874 miles the railroads built or planned in the "eighteen thirties and eighteen forties" by men like Hayne, Calhoun, Miller, Butler, Noble, Frenau, McDuffie, Law, Murray, Taylor, Shannon, Watt, Ford, and other South Carolinians, who not only planned and built, but supplied and raised the money right here in our own State for more than their part of most of what constitutes to-day the Southern Railway system, in spite of Mr. Jefferies's allegation there were no railroads in South Carolina "in the eighteen thirties and eighteen forties," and we were begging for men and capital to come here and build railroads.

Hayne, Miller, Calhoun, McDuffie, and all his corailroad pioneers knew what it was to serve their fellow men as well as their bondholders. They would not have served certain stock gamblers now engaged in "manicuring" the Southern Railway Co., and who have within the last three years manipulated the common stock from around $15 a share to $150 a share, increasing tenfold the value of the $130,000,000 worth of common stock, not one penny of which represents original railroad construction, and on which during the past three years these Wall Street gamblers have caused to be paid out of freight rates and passenger fares dividends recently increased to 8 per cent, apparently with a view to ultimately unloading their holdings, as time runs along, upon the investing public, composed largely of widows, orphans, and aged persons, pinching off in the effort to pay excessive dividends every possible penny and piece of property.

Our suggestion is that if the present "changed" policy of the heads of the Southern continues there be both a congressional and a State legislature investigation into the whole situation, covering not only the Wall Street manipulation of its common stock, the increasing of dividends from nothing to 8 per cent, but also the efforts of its present officers to beat down taxes, secure high valuation for rate basing, and otherwise take advantage of the public. Here is real opportunity for young men of courage and honest purpose to serve their State and country by getting into politics, becoming members of our legislature, making this a real live issue, and, like Portia, seeing to it that Shylock gets his pound of flesh—no more, no less, and nothing but flesh.

HENRY A. BELLOWS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, a few days ago it was asked that the joint resolution S. J. Res. 55 be taken up for immediate consideration, it providing for the payment to Mr. Henry A. Bellows of the salary that would have been due him had he remained on the Radio Commission and been confirmed. I asked that it go over, because I wanted to ask Mr. Bellows certain questions in the hearings then being held by the Interstate Commerce Committee. I am satisfied with the replies to my questions. I would, therefore, like to ask unanimous consent to call up that joint resolution and have it passed in order that he may receive his pay.

Mr. BORAH. What is the resolution?

Mr. DILL. It is a joint resolution providing to pay to Mr. Henry A. Bellows, who formerly served on the Radio Commission and who resigned, the salary that would have been due him had he remained on the commission and been confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 55. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I exactly understood the Senator. Is this to pay the gentleman for the time he actually served?

Mr. DILL. Yes; for the time he actually served.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, what about the other commissioners? Do we make provision for their pay?

Mr. DILL. A report as to their confirmation has not yet been made by the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. And if they are confirmed they will be paid?

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the evidence before the committee indicates that the commissioner in whose behalf the joint resolution has been offered favored the Radio Trust in the allocation of wave lengths, or whether his conduct was fair to all the public and those seeking licenses to operate radio stations?

Mr. DILL. That is a rather difficult question to answer fully, but I want to say, in justice to Mr. Bellows, that he was one of the most industrious members of the commission. The commission had no money with which to operate. It took charge of the situation and did the best it could, and while I did not approve and do not approve some of the actions of the commission in which Mr. Bellows concurred, I believe he was honest in his efforts, and I believe that having given his time to the work, that he is entitled to his pay. As to whether or not he has favored the so-called Radio Trust is a question upon which men might differ. I may say that the commission have not granted any licenses for broadcasting to exceed 90 days, so that the radio situation is not permanently tied up in favor of the so-called Radio Trust or anybody else. The commission are still free to allocate wave lengths and to change any station and to make any disposition of wave lengths that they may see fit on the expiration of the 90-day period. That, I think, must be said in their favor, whatever may be said in criticism of their other actions.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that he must be aware of the fact that numerous complaints have been received from persons residing in many parts of the United States against the conduct of the commission. Statements have been made by those persons to whom I refer that they have been discriminated against and that the Radio Trust, if there is a trust, has been favored and a policy pursued which tends to fasten the Radio Trust upon the country to the disadvantage of the public and those who seek an opportunity for legitimate broadcasting.

Mr. DILL. The term "legitimate broadcasting" is generally interpreted by every man who has a broadcasting station to suit his own needs and wishes. There has been much criticism and I myself believe that some of the criticism is justified. It does seem that the stations of the Radio Corporation, and affiliated stations, have been given more readily what they desire and other stations have been handicapped and shifted to other wave lengths and had their power cut. But I repeat that the broadcasting situation is not closed. Radio Corporation stations or any other set of stations are not in complete control of the air, and I believe these members of the commission are honestly striving to work out these problems in the interest of better radio service. If Mr. Bellows's case were up for confirmation I might discuss more in detail the policies of the commission, which I will probably do when those cases come before the Senate. But I believe that Mr. Bellows is entitled to pay for the time he served.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask a further question of the Senator?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Was the nomination of Mr. Bellows confirmed?

Mr. DILL. Mr. Bellows's nomination was not confirmed. Mr. Bellows served from his appointment in March until, I think, sometime in October or November—I am not certain—but he resigned from the commission, so he states, because he had no money with which to continue in his position. He was receiving no salary and he felt that he could not make any further sacrifices. He has gone back to work for the station for which he formerly worked.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator whether it is the purpose to continue the commission?

Mr. DILL. No proposed legislation has been reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee on that subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has any measure on the subject been introduced and is any such measure pending?

Mr. DILL. Bills have been introduced in both the House of Representatives and the Senate proposing to continue the commission for one year.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the commission ought to be continued by all means, and I hope the Senator from Washington will use his expert knowledge and his great interest in the matter in getting a bill reported out of the committee for that purpose.

Mr. DILL. I may say that hearings that are now going on before the Interstate Commerce Committee have been quite informative as to the policy of the commission and as to needs for its future service, and that question will be taken up by the committee in the near future, I think, and some measure reported.

Mr. McKELLAR. The truth of the business is, it seems to me, that we ought to have a permanent commission to deal with the subject of radio. That is my own judgment about it.

Mr. DILL. That was the view of the Senate when we passed the original bill, but the present law is a compromise with the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) for the relief of Henry A. Bellows, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment on page 1, after section 2, to strike out: "The moneys appropriated for the Federal Radio Commission by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, shall be available for the payment of such compensation," and in lieu thereof to insert: "The moneys made available for the fiscal year 1927 by the act of February 23, 1927, and those appropriated for the Federal Radio Commission by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, shall be available for the payment of such compensation." So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 1761 of the Revised Statutes, Henry A. Bellows shall be paid compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum for the period during which he served as a member of the Federal Radio Commission.

SEC. 2. The money made available for the fiscal year 1927 by the act of February 23, 1927, and those appropriated for the Federal Radio Commission by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, shall be available for the payment of such compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REHABILITATING FARM LANDS IN FLOOD AREAS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, for the present consideration of Order of Business No. 31, being the bill (S. 672) for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I think more than merely the title of the bill should be read, or the Senator from Arkansas might make a brief explanation of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to explain the bill. The bill authorizes a fund of $500,000 to be used in agricultural extension work in the flooded districts. The bill has been favorably reported by the Department of Agriculture, and there is printed in the committee's report a letter from the department addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the Senator from Oregon [Mr.

McNARY] fully explaining the necessity for the legislation and advocating its passage. A paragraph in the report reads as follows:

In the maintenance of the cooperative extension system under the Smith-Lever Act the major portion of the expense of employing county agents is paid from county funds, the usual plan being to pay half or less than half of the salary of such agents from State and Federal funds and to pay the remainder of the salary and office and travel expenses from county or other local funds. The present financial condition of the flooded counties will make it impossible for most of them to continue their contributions to the salaries and expenses of county extension agents at a time when the services of these agents are greatly needed to assist rural people in rebuilding their homes, renovating their premises, and reestablishing themselves on a satisfactory basis. Careful estimates made by the directors of extension in the several States affected indicate that approximately $500,000 will be needed to take over the portions of salaries now paid to county agents from county and local funds in counties seriously affected by the flood and to employ agricultural and home demonstration agents in such counties where agents are not now employed.

Mr. JONES. The proposed legislation, as I understand, applies to the present year?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; it is an emergency authorization.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] for the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That due to the emergency existing in the lower Mississippi Valley as a result of the flood of 1927, county funds available from taxation are so impaired throughtout the flood area that a continued support of the normal constructive activities of these counties, including the employment of county extension agents in agriculture and home economics, will be impossible. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, in cooperation with the several States and local agencies within these States, to employ such county extension agents necessary to aid in quickly and adequately rehabilitating these flood-devastated farm areas.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000 for the employment of county extension agents, traveling, subsistence, and other necessary expenses, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe for the proper carrying out of the purposes of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the full report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon the bill.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 32, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

REHABILITATING FARM LAND IN THE FLOOD AREAS

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 672):

This bill is a bill to authorize the appropriation of $500,000, to be used in accordance with the suggestion of the Department of Agriculture in the employment of county agents and home demonstration agents in the several States in which great damage was done by the floods last year. The authorization is only for the one year, at which time the Secretary of Agriculture, who strongly recommends the passage of this act, thought the counties would be able to resume the payment of the expenses herein mentioned.

The measure is an emergency measure designated for one year, and it is hoped that it may be passed speedily, as the need is great.

The letter of the Secretary of Agriculture is published herewith.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., December 31, 1927.

Hon. CHARLES L. McNARY,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your request of December 13 for a report on S. 672, a bill for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas, introduced by Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas on December 6. The bill recites the impairment of county tax funds in the lower Mississippi Valley as a result of the flood of 1927 and the consequent inability of the flood counties to continue the employment of county extension agents in agriculture and home economics; authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the States and local agencies in the employment of such county agents to aid in rehabilitation of flood devastated farm areas; and authorizes an appropriation of $500,000 for the employment of county extension agents, travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses.

The lower Mississippi Valley flood in the spring and summer of 1927 devastated farm areas in southeastern Missouri, southwestern Illinois, western Kentucky and Tennessee, eastern and central Arkansas, northwestern Mississippi, and eastern Louisiana. It prevented or greatly delayed and reduced crop production on several million acres of fertile farm lands, destroyed much livestock and many farm buildings, and injured business over a wide area. It caused a material reduction in local tax collections and at the same time entailed unusual expenditures from county funds for poor relief, the repair of roads and bridges, and other projects.

In the maintenance of the cooperative extension system under the Smith-Lever Act the major portion of the expense of employing county agents is paid from county funds, the usual plan being to pay half or less than half of the salary of such agents from State and Federal funds and to pay the remainder of the salary and office and travel expenses from county or other local funds. The present financial condition of the flooded counties will make it impossible for most of them to continue their contributions to the salaries and expenses of county extension agents at a time when the services of these agents are greatly needed to assist rural people in rebuilding their homes, renovating their premises, and reestablishing themselves on a satisfactory basis. Careful estimates made by the directors of extension in the several States affected indicate that approximately $500,000 will be needed to take over the portions of salaries now paid to county agents from county and local funds in counties seriously affected by the flood and to employ agricultural and home demonstration agents in such counties where agents are not now employed. In the case of agents now employed the portion of salaries now paid from State and regular Federal appropriations would continue to be so paid, but in the case of additional agents it would be necessary to pay their entire salaries from the appropriation here proposed. It is expected that the counties would supply office quarters and provide for necessary operating expenses.

The area devastated by the flood is largely populated with negro farmers, and especially effective extension work has been done in this region by negro men and women extension agents. The appropriation authorized in this bill (S. 672) would be sufficient to employ negro extension agents in the counties in the flood area with large negro population where such agents are not now employed, and to continue the services of agents now on the rolls. In some instances an agent may serve two or more counties, in which case provision would be made for travel expenses.

It is the thought of the directors of extension in the States concerned that the additional county extension agents employed under the authorization proposed in S. 672 could be supervised with the present administrative and supervisory forces and that practically the entire amount would be available for the employment of county extension agents.

Extension agents in the flooded counties have rendered extremely valuable service in flood relief and rehabilitation, and it is very desirable to continue and extend this service during the emergency period until the rural population has had opportunity to recover to some extent from the flood. The appropriation authorized in S. 672 should be sufficient to provide for the necessary county extension agents until June 30, 1929, at which time it is expected that the counties will be ready to resume their usual proportion of expense in the maintenance of such agents.

A similar proposal was made in H. J. Res. 4, introduced by Representative ASWELL and favorably reported by the House Committee on Agriculture. A statement regarding H. J. Res. 4 prepared by me was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget and returned to the department with the statement that the proposed legislation was not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Early and favorable action on S. 672 is strongly recommended.

Sincerely,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MONEY ADVANCED BY NEVADA

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from the preceding day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 106), submitted by Mr. PITTMAN on the 9th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report to the Senate the amount of money actually advanced and expended by the State of Nevada, or by the Territory of Nevada and assumed by said State, in aid of the Government of the United States during the War between the States, with such interest on the same as said State has actually paid, in accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court in New York v. The United States (100 U. S. 598); together with such amounts as have been heretofore reimbursed said State by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this resolution is supplemental to another resolution which is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, to consider which a subcommittee has been appointed. The resolution which has just been read is merely in aid of that; in other words, it does nothing except to ask for a report.

Mr. CURTIS. For the use of the committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is all.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no objection to it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHARLES H. SEND

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there is a bill on the calendar which is intended to give relief in the case of a homestead entry. The entryman entered the land in accordance with original surveys, but there was a mistake in the surveys. The department recommends the passage of the bill in their report.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Its calendar number is 49, being the bill (S. 440) for the relief of Charles H. Send. The concluding sentence of the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Department of the Interior in regard to the bill is as follows:

> The amendment of the entry as proposed would be a measure of relief from the loss Send has sustained by the erroneous allowance of the entry, and I recommend that the bill be enacted.

The committee has reported the bill unanimously; it will take but a moment to consider it; and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Senator to say that the bill had been recommended by the department.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it has been so recommended.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to amend the homestead entry of Charles H. Send, made March 20, 1924, so as to describe lot 3, section 14, township 4 south of range 15 west, of the Tallahassee meridian, Florida, containing 80 acres, in lieu of the subdivision now embraced therein, and to accept the commutation proof submitted by said Send on October 8, 1925, if found otherwise satisfactory, upon payment for the land at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SADIE KLAUBER

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the bill (S. 434) for the relief of Sadie Klauber, being Calendar No. 36, is similar to a bill which was passed through the Senate at the last session of the Congress. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read first.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to Sadie Klauber, so long as she continues to suffer with tuberculosis, the sum of $60 per month from and after April 16, 1926, as compensation for permanent physical disability resulting from disease contracted in line of duty while employed in the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 55, Fort Bayard, N. Mex. Such monthly payments shall be paid through the United States Employees' Compensation Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. Was the bill referred to the Veterans' Bureau and recommended by them?

Mr. BRATTON. It was referred to the Veterans' Bureau and a full résumé of the case was made. General Hines concluded with this language:

> It is believed that the committee will be able to judge for itself the merits of this bill and the propriety of its passage.

The Senate passed an identical bill during the last session of the Congress. A full explanation of it was then made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, Mr. President; I should like to read the report.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may we not proceed with the calendar until the Senator from Utah has had an opportunity to read the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be understood that when the Senator from Utah has read the report that we will recur to the bill of the Senator from New Mexico. I will ask if that is satisfactory to him?

Mr. SMOOT. I see it is quite a lengthy report, but it will not take me very long to read it. If we could proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII it will afford me an opportunity to read the report.

Mr. BRATTON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be temporarily passed over.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

CANAL ZONE PENAL CODE

The bill (S. 1256) to amend the penal code of the Canal Zone was announced as first in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with amendments, on page 2, line 5, after the word "exceeding" to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$200," and in the same line, after the word "exceeding" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "five years" and insert "one year," so as to make the bill read:

> Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 5, Title 16, of the Penal Code of the Canal Zone be amended by adding to section 357 the following section:
> "SEC. 357a. Any person who, without the consent of the owner, shall take, use, operate, or remove, or cause to be taken, used, operated, or removed, from a garage, stable, or other building or from any place or locality on a public or private highway, park, parkway, street, lot, field, inclosure, or space, an automobile or motor vehicle, and operate or drive, or cause the same to be operated or driven, for his own profit, use, or purpose, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $200 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both such fine and imprisonment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, do I understand that the bill applies only to the Canal Zone?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised from the title of the bill and its contents that it is a bill to amend the penal code of the Canal Zone.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not see the particular purpose of the bill. There may be some specific reason for its passage. It seems to me the measure rather confounds larceny with some form of trespass.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. BLEASE. I notice that the chairman of the committee is not present. I will state to the Senator from Utah that the only purpose of the bill is to reduce the amount of the fine and leave the matter to the discretion of the court.

As the law now stands, it provides for not less than $1,000 fine. It seems that that is considered excessive, and this bill is merely to leave it to the discretion of the court; not to make any change except as to the Panama Canal Zone, and only as to the punishment.

Mr. KING. If that is the only object, I have no objection to the measure; but it does seem to me that it confounds a trespass with a larceny. As I listened to the reading of the bill I could not tell whether it was an attempt to punish for grand larceny for the asportation of a machine or the taking of a machine unless there was a felonious intent; and the bill is silent as to whether there must be a felonious intent, whether they are to treat the taking of a machine as a mere trespass not amounting to a larceny.

I do not know the statute which exists in the Panama Canal Zone dealing with this subject; but if what the Senator has said is true, that it merely reduces the punishment from a peremptory fine of a thousand dollars and leaves it discretionary, I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Utah that the War Department, as I understand, communicated with the chairman of the committee, stating that the present law in the Panama Canal Zone with reference to the taking of an automobile without the owner's consent provided for a penalty of only $25 and constituted an offense only of disorderly conduct. The department therefore proposed the bill that is before the Senate, providing for a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment for five years.

This is new legislation. This is not amending any present penal statute with reference to the Panama Canal Zone. Upon my suggestion the fine was reduced to $200 by amendment and the imprisonment to not exceeding one year, so that, whatever the offense may be, it would not be a felony.

Personally I have some doubts with respect to the advisability of passing the bill at all; but I understand that many of the States have similar provisions penalizing the taking of an automobile without the owner's consent quite without regard to whether or not it is a felonious or willful taking in a criminal sense.

I think, Mr. President, and I have often so stated, that those who are out of jail owe some duty to those who may go to jail. It is a very simple thing to have a safety device or lock on an automobile. Every automobile manufactured within the last year or two has such a device; and where that device is employed it prevents the taking of an automobile without the owner's consent in most cases. The War Department referred particularly to "joy riders," particularly those who might pick up a car upon the street, or even parked in a yard, and drive out into the country or about a village, with no intention to steal the automobile, but merely for the purpose of recreation, as they might consider it, "joy riding."

I doubt very much whether we ought to dignify that sort of a trespass as an offense by making it a felony, and for that reason I suggested the reduction of the penalty so that it would be regarded only as a misdemeanor.

In the absence of the chairman of the committee I do not like to suggest that this matter be pressed at this time. Perhaps it ought to go over. I think, however, in conformity with the laws of the States generally, that there might well be some legislation upon this question. Perhaps the penalties imposed in the bill are too harsh. That, of course, is a question for every Senator to determine.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have had the same misgivings expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] with respect to this bill. As indicated by both Senators, it does penalize the taking of an automobile without the consent of the owner, whether that taking is felonious or criminal in its intent or not. I believe that the bill might very properly have the further consideration of the committee, and I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana moves that the bill under consideration, being Senate bill 1256, be rereferred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1946) relative to the pay of certain retired warrant officers and enlisted men and warrant officers and enlisted men of the reserve forces of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard, fixed under the terms of the Panama Canal act, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon objection, the bill will be passed over.

KATE MATHEWS

The bill (S. 3) for the relief of Kate Mathews was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on C[illegible]ns with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$10,000" and to insert "$5,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Kate Mathews, of San Antonio, Tex., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 as compensation for injuries received and expenses incurred by reason of having been struck by a United States Army automobile in San Antonio, Tex., on the 30th day of September, 1920, the automobile being driven at the time she was struck by First Lieut. Roscoe S. O'Hara, Air Service, United States Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Utah that this bill passed the Senate at the last session. It is one of the usual cases where a civilian was injured by collision with a vehicle operated by an officer of the United States Army or by some one in the service of the United States.

Mr. KING. What was the extent of the injury?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The lady was a school-teacher, advanced in years. She was laid up for several months and has been permanently crippled by this injury. The amount is the amount usually allowed in such cases. Her case is especially deserving on account of the fact that she has been disabled for life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SADIE KLAUBER

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has completed his investigation of Senate bill 434, Order of Business No. 36. I ask unanimous consent that we return to that number now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to return to Order of Business No. 36, Senate bill 434. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 434) for the relief of Sadie Klauber, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sadie Klauber, so long as she continues to suffer with tuberculosis, the sum of $60 per month from and after April 16, 1926, as compensation for permanent physical disability resulting from disease contracted in line of duty while employed in the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 55, Fort Bayard, N. Mex. Such monthly payments shall be paid through the United States Employees' Compensation Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall offer no objection to the passage of the bill at this time; but it is a very, very close question whether the bill ought to pass or not. So far as I am concerned, I shall give the benefit of the doubt to the woman. In doing so, we shall have to take the position that the woman was married to a soldier and had never been living with him for five years, although they were both in the same hospital. Of course, if she did not live with him, there is a reason for granting the pension, and it ought to be granted to her. If she did live with him, she has no right to it.

So far as I am personally concerned, I am going to give the woman the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question. If this measure is passed and becomes a precedent which we shall follow, will not every employee of the Government who receives an injury or who becomes ill, and that illness is protracted, or is of short duration for that matter, have a valid claim upon the Government?

Mr. BRATTON. No; Mr. President. This case presents an unusual state of facts, and, in my judgment, has an unusual amount of merit. For the benefit of the Senator from Utah, I shall state the facts.

Mrs. Klauber married her husband at New York April 14, 1921. The very next day he left New York for Fort Bayard, and became a patient in the tubercular hospital there. She went thereto two months later; and in July, 1921, she became a nurse in the hospital, and was assigned to the treatment of tubercular patients, being ex-service men, her duties being principally to spray their noses and throats. She continued in that employment for nearly four years, when she was stricken with pulmonary tuberculosis contracted in line of duty.

The report of the committee is supported by statements from six doctors that, in all probability, she contracted tuberculosis from her treatment of these patients. She makes an affidavit, her husband makes an affidavit, and four ex-service men at Fort Bayard make affidavits that during that four-year period she lived with the female employees of the hospital, while her husband lived in the hospital with the men. They lived apart. The Employees' Compensation Commission denied her claim for benefit under the law, on the theory that she probably contracted the disease from her husband. I repeat that she testified that during all that period of time she and her husband lived apart. He testified to the same thing. Four ex-service men in the fort make affidavits to the same facts.

Six doctors say that in their judgment probably she contracted the disease in line of duty.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to inquire what would be the compensation allowed under the law were she to come within the terms of that act?

Mr. BRATTON. I understand it would be the same amount as that fixed by the bill.

On these facts I am convinced that the bill has abundant merit, and should pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 19) for the relief of Frank Topping and others was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. KING. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no report accompanying this bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Let it go over.

Mr. SMOOT. The author of the bill asks that it may go over.

Mr. CAPPER. I suggest that we pass over the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

CLARA E. NICHOLS

The bill (S. 120) to extend the benefits of the United States employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Clara E. Nichols was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Clara E. Nichols, a former employee of the education and recreation division, Adjutant General's office, War Department, Los Angeles, Calif., the provision of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Chief Clerk read the report (No. 21), submitted by Mr. BAYARD on the 9th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 120) to extend the benefits of the United States employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Clara E. Nichols, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The facts are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 75, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report.

[S. Rept. No. 75, 69th Cong., 1st sess.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2096) to extend the benefits of the United States employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Clara E. Nichols, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The facts are fully set forth in Senate Report No. 989, Sixty-eighth Congress, second session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report.

[S. Rept. No. 989, 68th Cong., 2d sess.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3618) to extend the benefits of the United States employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Clara E. Nichols, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to waive the statute of limitations in the application filed by Clara E. Nichols, a former employee of the education and recreation division, Adjutant General's Office, War Department, Los Angeles, Calif., the provision of an act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes,' approved September 7, 1916, in order that she may receive the same consideration as though she had applied within the specified time required by law."

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Clara E. Nichols, a woman of about 30 years of age, without relatives, kin, or means upon which to depend, June 4, 1917, entered the Government service as a first-grade clerk, under civil-service classification, in the property section of the Ordnance Office, War Department, under Chief Clerk Hugh M. Purcell. She worked during the flu epidemic of 1917 and also of 1918, and in addition to her official duties as clerk was assigned to and did welfare work among the sick employees of the Government. In doing this welfare work she came in contact with many suffering with the flu, some of whom later died.

All of the evidence submitted by affidavit shows that the conditions under which the Government employees worked at Seventh and E Streets, and also at the Hoge Building, and also at the Ford Building on Pennsylvania Avenue, were very bad, dangerous to health, and many employees suffered from these conditions.

November 11, 1918, she was transferred to the office of the director of civilian marksmanship at 1115 Woodward Building, Maj. Richard D. La Garde in charge.

Early in January, 1919, the claimant suffered an attack of Spanish flu.

December, 1919, shortly after Christmas, the claimant had a second attack of the flu.

January 24, 1920, the claimant had a hemorrhage.

March 11, 1920, she had an X-ray examination, which disclosed pulmonary tuberculosis.

Major La Garde, in the interest of the other employees in his division, refused to let the claimant come back into the office for work, and she was transferred to the Militia Bureau.

April 21, 1920, the claimant took up work in the Militia Bureau and continued there until September 11, 1920.

September 11, 1920, the claimant had a second X-ray examination to see what progress she had made in fighting the tuberculosis ravages, and, much to her surprise, found that the area involved had doubled since her former examination, and she immediately made efforts for a transfer to California, where the climate would be more conducive to her recovery.

October 24, 1920, she assumed her duties as bookkeeper in the United States Army motion-picture service at Los Angeles, Calif.

May 20, 1921, the Los Angeles office was closed and the work consolidated with the work at the San Francisco office, and the claimant was transferred to San Francisco to continue her work.

In August, 1921, claimant's voice gave out, and she was unable to speak above a whisper until the following year while in New Mexico.

December 3, 1921, the work was finished at San Francisco and the office closed.

Since December 3, 1921, the claimant has been unable to work in any position.

June 23, 1922, claimant left San Francisco for Los Angeles to rest and recover sufficiently to go on to New Mexico, where her physicians advised the climate would be better and more conducive to her recovery.

August 1, 1922, she left Los Angeles for Albuquerque, N. Mex., in which vicinity she has since remained and now is.

January 20, 1924, the claimant, for the first time, learned of the existence of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission.

January 21, 1924, she wrote to the commission for blanks, after which she secured, by correspondence with her various chiefs and associates, affidavits in support of the application she desired to file with the compensation commission, and these were secured from all over the United States, and one from the Canal Zone.

July 25, 1924, the claimant filed her application, supported by the affidavits, doctors' certificates, and other evidence required for compensation.

The claimant, having used all of her available income and means to effect a cure while she was still working, found herself, at the conclusion of her services in San Francisco (December 3, 1921), entirely without funds and unable to follow any employment.

Since that time she has borrowed from month to month for her needs, hoping for a restoration of health and return to work that she may earn, live, and repay the loans various friends have kindly made her.

The aggregate amount of borrowed money is somewhere near $2,500.

Her physical condition, although somewhat improved, is retarded, and the effect largely overcome by reason of the mental worry over her helpless financial condition.

The United States Employees' Compensation Commission was obliged to reject her claim for the reason that it was not filed until August 7, 1924, while her disability was complete from and after December 3, 1921, and the law under which this commission is created and operates provides a limitation of one year from date of disability within which claim of compensation may be made, leaving the commission without discretion.

December 9, 1924, Senator Bursum, of New Mexico, introduced S. 3618 for the relief of the claimant, and this bill, in its effect, merely waives the statutory limitation written into the act creating the commission, leaving it entirely to the commission to act in a judicial capacity upon the evidence submitted by this claimant.

The director of ordnance welfare, under date of November 5, makes the following report on claimant's service and condition:

"I have been in touch with Miss Nichols for the past four years and our welfare board has rendered substantial financial assistance during this period and knows her distressing condition intimately.

"In 1917 during the epidemic of influenza she contracted this disease and, because of inadequate nursing facilities at this time and the overcrowded housing conditions, it left her in a tubercular condition. She was soon after this transferred to San Francisco with the hope that the change of climate would at least arrest the disease, but her condition seemed too far advanced. In January, 1920, she had quite a severe hemorrhage and since that time she has steadily grown worse, and for the past two years she has not been able to perform work of any kind.

"Miss Nichols has no living relatives, and, aside from what funds her friends and associates have contributed, she has no money to make her at least comfortable for the short period of time it is felt she will live. Her physician here, Dr. Everett M. Ellison, of 1720 M Street NW., told me he was surprised to hear that she is still living.

"She has presented her case to the compensation commission, together with letters from her physician and people with whom she has worked in the departments. I feel that Miss Nichols is just as much entitled to compensation as one of our soldier boys, since her condition was contracted in line of duty.

"The ordnance welfare board sincerely hopes that her case will receive favorable action at the earliest possible date.

"Very respectfully,

"Mrs. L. H. PRINTUP,
"Director of Ordnance Welfare."

CONCLUSIONS

The act creating the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, effective September 7, 1916, is merely an act to authorize the Federal Government as an employer, to do those humane things which the considerate private employer does voluntarily.

The section limiting the time within which claims may be presented for the consideration of this commission is a wholesome provision intended to compel the presentation of claims within a reasonable time after the disability while the evidence to defend a fraudulent claim is available to the Government.

It is probably wise to withhold authority from the commission to exercise discretion with reference to this time limit.

The power to create this act, which is vested in Congress, should also, through Congress, waive the limit written into the act whenever the facts presented disclose that justice will be meted out by the waiver of such limit.

The facts as presented by Clara E. Nichols, claimant under this bill, and supported by the affidavits of reputable officials under whom she worked or by whom she was employed and treated, clearly presents a case where justice can only be meted out by waiving the time limit for presentation of her claim.

In addition to this, the claimant also makes a showing that she did not have knowledge of the existence of the Employees' Compensation Commission until the day before she wrote for blanks upon which to file her claim.

Ignorance of law is said to be no excuse, and as a legal maxim this is true, but in everyday life and in the dealings between men it is not true and should not be, and even in course of law and equity ignorance of the law is considered by "tempering justice with mercy."

It must always be remembered that until recently the Comptroller General of the United States uniformly held that the United States Employees' Compensation Committee could not pay claims for disability resulting from illness incurred in the service, but only for accident, and therefore Miss Nichols's claim would have been rejected by the commission for this reason even if she had filed it within the statutory limit.

The claimant is helpless, physically and financially, and is fast becoming a mental wreck because of these disabilities.

She evidently gave faithful service to her Government during the period of her several employments, and in rendering that service contracted the vicious, destructive disease that is sapping her life away.

It is just such cases as these that the compensation act of September 7, 1916, was made to meet.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE B. BOOKER CO.

The bill (S. 342) for the relief of George B. Booker Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George B. Booker Co., of Wilmington, Del., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $102.69, said sum being due George B. Booker Co. for merchandise furnished to the Reedy Island Naval Station mess during the year 1918.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. H. KING

The bill (S. 1766) for the relief of R. H. King was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "pay," to insert the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the Postmaster General says:

> The report shows that the postmaster was lax in the manner of handling the post-office accounts and cash. I am therefore of the opinion that this case does not merit legislative relief.

I therefore object.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, let me state to the Senator that the postmaster was found by the inspectors to have been guilty of no dishonest conduct. He is over 60 years of age. He paid the amount of the loss out of his own funds, and he was in such severe financial straits that he was compelled to use his life insurance to pay it. In view of the fact that there was no dishonesty on his part, the committee felt that the amount should be made good to him. The bill passed the Senate at the last session, and there are numerous precedents.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true; but I would not want to vote for a bill where the Postmaster General says that the Government is not responsible. There are no mitigating circumstances that would justify payment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Would the Senator condemn this man for this loss? It is my judgment that he took every reasonable precaution.

Mr. SMOOT. If it was his own fault, he ought to be condemned.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Congress has on a number of occasions indemnified other people under circumstances like this.

Mr. SMOOT. I hardly think it has where there was such a report as in this case. If we allow a bill like this to become a law it simply is tantamount to saying to every postmaster in the country, "You can lay money around anywhere, and if it is lost you can get a refund."

Mr. KING. Or any employee of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; any employee of the Government. The time will come, and I hope it will not be long in coming, when there will be some kind of protection to the Government, by bond or otherwise, so that in cases like this, and others that happen and come to this body so often, the Government of the United States is not going to lose money. When a postmaster is appointed he is supposed to use diligence, and he is responsible for the money that comes into his hands. In this case the Postmaster General says that this man was lax in his duty, and for that reason lost this money.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me ask the Senator this question: If money has been lost under other postmasters under similar circumstances, should not relief be granted here. The Senator knows that the Congress has passed a number of measures like this.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not like this. Wherever there is a burglary, and a safe is broken open, Congress has never failed to refund the money that was stolen, or credit the postmaster.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In this case war savings stamps were stolen from the bank in which the postmaster had deposited them.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly they were stolen, but they were stolen because the postmaster was lax in his duty. I would like to have the bill go over, and I will talk with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

ESTATE OF JOHN STEWART

The bill (S. 1622) for the relief of the estate of John Stewart, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report (No. 18) submitted by Mr. STEPHENS from the Committee on Claims on the 9th instant.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 52) submitted by Mr. McMASTER, favoring a reduction of tariff schedules and the consideration of tariff legislation at the present session of Congress.

TAX REDUCTION

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, for three days we have been discussing the question of modifying or changing our tariff laws. The discussion has been very interesting and perhaps helpful, but can result in no definite action. The country is interested in a question that can be settled without delay, and that we ought to be now considering.

I call attention to the fact that before this Congress convened it was heralded far and wide that the chief and immediate business of this session was to be tax reduction. The country was promised early consideration and early enactment of a tax reduction law. The House of Representatives passed a new revenue bill which came into the Senate on December 17. Since that time no action has been taken in the Senate. There has been no meeting of the Finance Committee to consider this important measure. No statement explanatory of this delay has been made upon the floor of the Senate. Statements have been made from time to time in the press to the effect that consideration of the bill had been postponed or was to be postponed until March. I believe it was also asserted in the press that a majority of the members of the Finance Committee favored such postponement. There is now an apparent purpose to keep this measure buried in the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Utah that the people of the country are vitally interested in the matter of tax reduction. Many business interests of the country that at present are far from prosperous are very anxious to have the Congress carry out the promise which was made, that they would be given tax relief without delay. I now ask the Senator from Utah why some action has not been taken? What is the reason for the delay? Why has there been a change of attitude? Is it politics? Why has not the promise been kept to act promptly to relieve the tax burdens of all classes of taxpayers, the one thing which the majority party repeatedly promised the people of this country they would do?

Evidently there has been some change of mind, some change of policy. It has been intimated that it was for political reasons. I think the country and the Members of the Senate are entitled to know officially, and not through the press, what is the attitude of the chairman of the Finance Committee and what is the attitude of the majority members of the Finance Committee. I would like to have the Senator make any statement that he cares to make in that connection.

I repeat, I do not know of any public question in which the people of the country are more interested to-day than tax reduction. There is a general demand upon all sides for it, and I hope the Senator from Utah, who is in charge of the bill in the Finance Committee, will hasten consideration of the measure in order that we may give the relief which the country has been asking for and which it is expecting.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I intended to call a meeting of the Finance Committee during the past week, but on account of the illness of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the ranking Democratic member of the committee, I have not called a meeting of the committee. When he left here for the Christmas holiday recess he expected to be back on the Friday following the opening of the session.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Aside from that, has not the Senator made the statement that the matter was postponed because——

Mr. SMOOT. I will cover the question if the Senator will allow me to do so. For that reason there has been no meeting of the committee. That is in answer to one of the questions the Senator asked.

As to the early consideration of the revenue bill, I wish to give my views. The committee has not met, but I have every reason to believe, from what I have heard from members of the committee, that their views coincide with mine as to the time to report the bill.

It is true that the American people have been promised a reduction in taxation. No one is more anxious to bring that about than myself. I doubt whether there is a Member of the Senate who would even question the wisdom of such action. There is, however, a situation which I myself believe ought to be taken into consideration before the passage of a revenue bill at this session of Congress. In the first place, if appropriations are made in response to all of the demands which will be forced upon Congress, appropriations sufficient to cover them all, the situation will be quite different as to how much reduction we should make in taxes. By the postponement of the consideration of the bill until after March 15 no taxpayer will lose anything.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How will we, after March 15, know any more about what appropriation bills will be passed than we know now?

Mr. SMOOT. I think a number of them will be agreed to by that time, either defeated or passed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the session will not adjourn on March 15? Bills involving appropriations will be under consideration until the very end of the session.

Mr. SMOOT. But we will know what the regular appropriations will be. We have a good idea now as to what they will be, just the same as we would have in any session of the Congress. But in addition there are appropriations demanded for the Boulder Dam, for flood relief, for farm relief, for the canal——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If we wait for all of those matters, it may be next June before we consider the tax bill, instead of after March 15.

Mr. SMOOT. No. If the House pass upon them, as they think they will be able to do, some of them will be over here very soon. I as chairman of the Finance Committee, and I believe the Senator would take the identical position as a member of that committee, believe that it would be unwise to pass a revenue bill which would result in a deficit at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But that has not been the practice in the past. We have gone ahead and had hearings on revenue bills without considering other pending legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; when we knew we would have ample money to meet every obligation on the part of the Government. But things now are quite different than they have been in the past, with all these great projects proposed, and from what I understand from expressions I received from other Senators some of those measures are going to pass.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that a great many taxpayers are entitled to relief in the matter of the taxes due March 15.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is not hurting any of the business of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator said that would not interfere with the payment of taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. It will affect the theaters, perhaps, and a few others paying an excise tax, but that is all. They collect the amount of the tax imposed now from their patrons. If the bill passes after the 15th of March, whatever the bill may provide by way of reduction in taxes for the year 1928 can be refunded if paid by the taxpayer. If he pays the whole tax on March 15, which many do where it is in a small amount, then whatever reduction is made will be refunded to him. If he pays the quarterly payment that is assessed against him under the existing law on March 15—and there is no change in the law until that time—from the second payment on the 15th of June he can deduct whatever he is entitled to deduct by reason of the reductions which Congress at this session may provide. So the taxpayers will lose nothing and the Government itself will be absolutely safe and sure of having sufficient money to meet all its requirements, both the ordinary requirements which we have and the special ones that are bound to be created at this session of Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the taxpayer on March 15 must make his return based on existing law.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator thinks if the bill is enacted later, as it will be in view of his plan——

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That refund payments can be made to those taxpayers who pay under the present tax law?

Mr. SMOOT. We did that once before, and there was no trouble about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the Senator expects to make the legislation retroactive?

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. There is no question about it, I will say to the Senator, and no taxpayer will lose anything at all.

On March 25, 10 days after the returns are in, we will know what taxes we are going to receive from the business of 1927. There is no question to-day about the expenses of 1928. We have to look at this matter as applying to the business of 1929, and the only safe way, the only businesslike way in my opinion—and I expect the Senator to agree to it—is to be absolutely safe. The only way we can be safe in this matter is to wait and find out and know positively what taxes we are going to receive from the business of 1927. It is claimed by some that the business of 1927 is just as good as for 1926. The volume is good, but I know that in the last three months the manufacturers and the merchants have been crowding sales, and I know that the prices they have asked for goods are not as great as they were during the nine months preceding.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There has been a curtailment of prosperity then?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not as great prosperity to the man who is selling his goods, but it is prosperity to the men and women who buy them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator expects a falling off in income-tax receipts on March 15?

Mr. SMOOT. Taking the whole year, it may be that the gain in the United States may be less than we expect, but if it is not less, then we will know what sort of a bill to pass, and there will be no chances to assume whatever.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not care to prolong the discussion.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before the Senator from Utah takes his seat?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Utah has referred to the Boulder Dam bill and the farm relief bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I can mention three or four others, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator believe that the Boulder Dam bill and the farm relief bill will be disposed of by the 15th of March?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and also to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] that after the 25th day of March, or perhaps a little later than that, we shall know what the income from the business of 1927 will be. Then we shall be able to judge as to what bills that shall then not have been passed upon by Congress may be enacted, and take up the revenue bill for consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then there will have to be several weeks of discussion in committee and several weeks of discussion on the floor here, and it may be far into the summer before the revenue bill shall be passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I expect Congress will have concluded its work by June 15, and I am quite sure that the revenue bill will have been passed before that date.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So far as I am concerned, I want to close the colloquy. I thank the Senator for answering my inquiries and for the information and assurances which he has given to the Senate, I believe for the first time. Tax reduction is considered by the people of this country to be the most important question before the Senate and the House of Representatives. I think they are disappointed at the dilatory methods we have pursued in delaying action upon this measure, and I, as an humble Member of the Senate and of the Committee on Finance, want to protest against further delay and urge upon the Senator, for whose ability and whose capacity I have great regard, the importance of getting down to the one constructive, helpful thing that we can now do, namely, help business and the taxpayers in general by reducing taxes immediately. I fear, however, this delay may ultimately mean the possibility of no tax reduction.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that if my mail is any criterion as to the attitude of the taxpayers of this country, they are almost unanimously in favor of waiting until after March, and then to have Congress pass a tax reduction bill which we know will provide sufficient revenue to meet the requirements of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Finance Committee and, therefore, I do not speak ex cathedra; neither am I in the confidence of the administration with reference to the tax-reduction measure; but the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] may well take into consideration that there are Senators in this body who are not in favor of tax reduction at all, and particularly so, even if it should be in midsummer, until we know something about the obligations which we will have to meet in the future.

I am not nearly so much interested in tax reduction as I am interested in whose taxes are going to be reduced. If we continue the program which we have pursued for the last 10 years we are going to reach a situation in this country pretty soon where we shall have a public debt of some $18,000,000,000, upon which we will be paying interest of some $700,000,000, and an annual Budget of three and a half billion dollars, with other tremendous expenses, and the entire burden loaded onto the average taxpayer. It has been systematically brought about that those who are most able to meet the great burdens which came out of the World War are being constantly relieved of the duty to pay in accordance with their ability to pay, while the vast burden of the Government is being left upon the average taxpayer.

There is no concealing the fact, Mr. President, that we can not make the appropriations which Senators here in good faith are urging and have any tax reduction at this session which will be anything else than a mere subterfuge, because while taxes may be reduced temporarily, if we proceed making appropriations as we now propose to do, the taxes will necessarily have to be placed back upon somebody. There is a proposal of some $300,000,000 for farm relief, and of from $400,000,000 to $600,000,000 for flood relief.

Let me digress to say that I trust we are not going back in providing adequate flood relief to the old practice of cheese paring and political appropriations. Flood control is a task which we have to perform, which the National Government must take care of, and which it ought not to be embarrassed to take care of when the time comes to take care of it by reason of Congress having passed tax reduction bills which we ought not to pass.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator from Idaho contemplate that the vast expenditure necessary for flood control is to be paid out of current funds?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean that bonds should be issued? Most assuredly I am opposed to issuing bonds under any circumstances or conditions. That involves another attempt to reduce taxes upon those who can pay. To issue bonds will mean finally to put their payment and the interest charges upon the average taxpayer.

Mr. COPELAND. If an expenditure of a billion dollars should be required—and I should not be surprised if the cost of flood control should rise to that point—does the Senator believe that we should make provision out of the current funds for the payment of that vast sum?

Mr. BORAH. I do not contemplate that we shall expend the entire sum immediately, but I contemplate that such an obligation will be incurred and that it will have to be met. I also contemplate that it will be met out of current funds by the National Government.

Mr. COPELAND. Does not the Senator consider, however, that that is a project that has to do with the welfare of the people of the Mississippi Valley for years and generations to come, and that we might well distribute the cost of it over a long period instead of having the present generation pay for it?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know how we are going to distribute it over a long period unless it is proposed that the States of the Mississippi Valley shall issue bonds and take care of some of its aspects in that way. Is that what the Senator favors?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly not. I think it is a national problem and should be taken care of by the National Government, but I can see no reason why we should pay an enormous sum out of the Treasury this year or next year or for two or three years when we are paying for a project which is going to take care of the people for hundreds of years to come.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we ought to have a program with reference to flood control which will embody a complete plan and provide for a complete work when it is finished, and whatever obligation that may impose upon the National Treasury the National Treasury ought to be prepared to take care of it.

I myself am not in favor of unloading this work upon the States in the valley nor in any way shirking the real responsibility which rests upon us.

Then we have Boulder Dam and housing of our Army.

With reference to the Boulder Dam project, it is my judgment that if we longer continue doing nothing in regard to that situation we are conniving at a disaster which will be only less serious than that which has been suffered in the valley of the Mississippi. We should turn our attention to the building up of the internal resources and the internal improvements of the country, and take care of them regardless of the politics which is involved in a proposed tax reduction.

In addition to that, Mr. President, we now have the indorsement of a program to begin what is practically a naval race which, it is already estimated in the beginning, will cost $800,000,000 and if the real figures were given, the cost of the program which is now proposed would be over a billion dollars.

So, Mr. President, while we are talking about tax reduction Congress is being urged, and will be urged, to make appropriations for projects and enterprises which make it absolutely impossible to consider any tax reduction of real and permanent value, and, so far as I am individually concerned, I am opposed to tax reduction under the present circumstances. I am opposed to it for the reason, in the first place, that I do not believe it will help those who ought to be helped; I do not believe it will relieve the burden where it ought to be relieved; and, secondly, because we have these obligations to meet and should meet them. If any way can be found to meet these expenditures and at the same time reduce taxes, I should listen with interest to the scheme.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I inquire what is the business before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER] is before the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. May I inquire, has this resolution been modified by the Senator from South Dakota?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending which has been offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. COPELAND. But the Senator from South Dakota himself has not offered any amendment, as I understand?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota has not modified his resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from South Dakota. Although in its present form I could not vote for it, I assume that before we are called upon to vote there will be some modification. As I understand the real purpose of the resolution, it is intended to call the attention of the country to the fact that "there must be protection for all or protection for none." This is a warning to the Congress that the farmers of America will no longer tolerate a situation where the great industrial and manufacturing concerns are highly protected and made prosperous by reason of protection while the farmer is given no measure of protection.

I am interested in the welfare of the farmer in spite of the fact that I come from the great metropolis of New York. I wish to call attention to the fact that New York State is one of the great farming States of America. My State stands eleventh in the value of farm products. The only States in which the value of farm products exceeds the value of farm products of my State are Texas, because of its cotton; California, by reason of its fruit; Iowa and Illinois, because of their corn; and then New York stands shoulder to shoulder with Kansas, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, and Ohio. In not one of the last-mentioned group of States does the farm value of its products exceed the farm value of the products of my State by more than $25,000,000 a year.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator the figures as to the money value of crop production in the various States?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not have the exact figures, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I notice that the Senator named Texas first.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to call especial attention to the fact that Texas leads the Nation in the value of its farm crops.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator that the order in which I named these various States is the order of the value of the products.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am very glad to have that brought out.

Mr. COPELAND. Texas comes first; next comes California; then Iowa and Illinois; then, as I have said, Kansas, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, Ohio, and then New York. Therefore, Mr. President, anything having to do with the welfare of the farmer is a matter of great concern to any Senator from the State of New York.

I was much interested in the statement of the President in his message. He said—I quote from President Coolidge's last message:

> It is often stated that a reduction of tariff rates on industry would benefit agriculture. It would be interesting to know to what commodities it is thought this could be applied. Everything the farmer uses in farming is already on the free list.

Mr. President, they must have a different way of farming in Vermont than they do in New York, because there are many things used in farming which are not on the free list. I want to call attention to some of these things, because the farmer has consistently voted the Republican ticket. I have no reason to believe he will stop voting that ticket.

The farmer representatives on the other side of the aisle are very much excited about this situation. They have not hesitated to blame the Republican Party, but when it comes time to vote next fall they will vote the Republican ticket just the same. However, I think the farmers of America ought to know how the protective-tariff system affects them, and how much they have been benefited and how much they have been harmed by that system.

I want to say in discussing this matter—and that is the reason why I said in the beginning that I could not support this resolution in its present form—that I believe in the protective-tariff system. I think it is tremendously important to this country that we should have a scientifically applied tariff. I think it is important to my State that there should be such a tariff. We are great manufacturers of cuffs and collars and shirts and paints and paintbrushes and a thousand other things where if we had no protective tariff the workmen and the manufacturers of my State would come in competition with the peasant labor of Europe, and these manufactories would be stifled. But there can be no doubt that this tariff was written in the interest of several great manufacturing concerns, and the farmer was not thought of or his welfare considered when this tariff bill was written.

The history of the protective-tariff system is interesting. In the early history of our country the hatters in Danbury found themselves in competition with the men who made hats in Hartford; and in order that that competition, which lessened the profits, might be done away with, they formed combinations, or what we call to-day trusts. In due time these combinations gained political strength and they were able to control legislation.

It was not long, however, before these combinations found that while they had benefited temporarily, they were in competition with the manufacturers of Europe; and so the question arose, "How are we going to do away with this competition?" Then these powerful organizations came to Washington, and out of it came the protective-tariff system.

The farmer is the victim, because, in spite of the optimism of the President, it is not true that everything the farmer uses is on the free list.

There is another matter which is of vital interest to the farmer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves that subject?

Mr. COPELAND. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood the Senator, he said that he regarded the protective tariff as a scientific tax system. Did I correctly understand him?

Mr. COPELAND. No; the Senator did not understand me correctly. I said that I am in favor of a scientifically applied tariff system; but certainly the present tariff law of 1922 is not such a system.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that a tariff law by which $605,000,000 is raised by the Government annually, and the American consumer is taxed not only in that sum but in $4,000,000,000, speaking in round numbers, for the benefit of favored classes, can be made into a scientific system?

Mr. COPELAND. No; not the way that we write tariffs. It never can be done in that way; and there is no more glaring example of what the Senator has in mind than the tariff on sugar.

It is costing the housewives of this country $250,000,000 a year by reason of the increased price put upon sugar, growing out of this tariff.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York a question or two?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. How many pounds of sugar are consumed in the household at the table annually?

Mr. COPELAND. Suppose the Senator gives me those figures. I assume he has them.

Mr. BROUSSARD. About 30 pounds. The rest of it is used in the manufacture of condensed milk, candy, gums, tobacco, and various other articles where the duty on sugar cuts no figure at all in determining the price. So when it is charged that the American household is being mulcted to the tune of $240,000,000, that figure ought to be cut in two three or four times.

Mr. COPELAND. In view of what the Senator from Louisiana has said, I will change the statement that the housewives are paying $250,000,000 and say that the householders of this country are paying it.

Mr. SMOOT. And if they did not we would have to collect the taxes from some other source.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator think the duty on sugar affects the price of gum or candy or condensed milk or tobacco or thousands of other articles in the manufacture of which sugar is used?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly I do.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator think that if the duty on sugar were lessened or taken off entirely it would be possible to buy candy for less than $1 a pound?

Mr. COPELAND. Not the dollar-a-pound kind, no; but candy would be sold for less money.

Mr. BROUSSARD. What about the price of chewing gum? Would that be lessened?

Mr. COPELAND. I assume it would. I am not well informed on that subject.

Mr. BROUSSARD. In other words, the Senator believes that if the duty of 1.76 on sugar was removed there would be a reduction all the way down the line, even on chewing tobacco?

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say to the Senator from Louisiana that I do not believe he heard what I said a little while ago. I would not have all the tariff taken off sugar, any more than I would take it off a lot of other things.

I honor the Senator from Louisiana because he is here to protect the interests of his State; and I want to pass word on to his constituents that he is always doing it well.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I be permitted to say that my people believe that this duty is not high enough.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I am surprised that the Senator from Louisiana does not ask the Senator from New York what he thinks the price of sugar would be if there were no protective tariff on it, and, as a result, the beet-sugar men and the cane-sugar men in this country were driven out of business, and we were at the mercy of the foreign producers. I wonder if he knows what the price of sugar would be then.

Mr. SMOOT. You can judge that from war times, when they raised it to 24 and 25 cents a pound.

Mr. McLEAN. It went to 30 cents a pound to the wholesalers.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I deliberately brought in this reference to sugar because I knew it would "stir up the animals." If we were to take off the tariff on sugar and pay a bounty, we could save $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator where he would get that $100,000,000 from? He has to have it from some source to pay the expenses of the Government. Where would the Senator place that burden, then?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am frank to say that I could not get it, because the watch dog of the Treasury here would prevent it.

Mr. SMOOT. But if you could, and if the watch dog should say, "Yes; we will take it off," where would you place that burden of $100,000,000?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, Mr. President, as the Senator well knows, I am not anticipating that that is going to happen; but I do know that if I may trust at all the word of those engaged in the sugar business in my section of the world, the tariff on cane sugar—as it involves cane sugar—could be materially reduced.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think sugar is about the only product raised on the farm the price of which is less now than it was before the war. I want to say to the Senator that as far as the industry is concerned under existing conditions, with overproduction of sugar in Java and Cuba and different sections of the world, the stock of the sugar companies is almost worthless. Not only that, but I wish to say to the Senator——

Mr. COPELAND. Just one moment. The Senator spoke about Cuba.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment; I want to finish this. Here are the Philippine Islands, which have a free market for sugar into the United States. They can raise sugar for less money than it can be raised for in Cuba. I have a copy of the interview between the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the largest sugar producer in the Philippines, in which he admitted to the Senator that he had made approximately 50 per cent on his capital stock that year. Not only that, but when the Senator from Montana asked him, "What wages are you paying your men in the sugar fields of the Philippines?" his answer was, "Forty cents a day"; and yet that flood of sugar coming into this country, that was limited to 300,000 tons before the act of 1913, has no limitation now.

This body was told that it was impossible to produce at any time more than 300,000 tons of sugar in the Philippines, but last year they produced more than double that amount, and all of the American market here was open free to them. Not only that, but I want to call the Senator's attention to Porto Rico. We imposed a small duty of 80 cents or a dollar upon sugar cane, and what are the Porto Ricans doing now? They are shipping sugar cane from San Domingo into Porto Rico and making it into sugar, and then from Porto Rico bringing the sugar into the United States free of duty. All these things you have to take into consideration when you are discussing the question; and it is a big question at that.

Mr. McLEAN. What has been the average price of sugar since the enactment of the tariff law of 1922?

Mr. SMOOT. As I have said, it is the only farm product I know of that has not advanced in price. The Senator could have gone down the street several months ago and bought sugar at retail for 5 cents a pound. Not only that, but as far as the beet grower is concerned the farmer gets his $7.50 a ton for his beets, no matter what the price of sugar is, and if there is anything made he gets half of the profit. Can farmers object to that? They are not objecting to it; and I will say to the Senator that there is not a commodity raised on the farm that is cheaper to-day than it was before the war with the exception of sugar.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah lives up to the high reputation I give him in all the speeches I make in the State of New York. I say up there, and I say now, that he is the ablest defender of the sugar tariff on the face of the earth. Now, I want to ask him a question. Does the tariff on sugar increase its price in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it increases the price.

Mr. COPELAND. What is the aggregate amount?

Mr. SMOOT. One dollar and seventy-six cents a hundred.

Mr. COPELAND. But how much do the housewives, or, let me say, how much do American citizens pay for sugar in excess of what they would pay if it were not for this tariff?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they pay anything in excess. If you place the sugar in the hands of five or six refiners in the United States, I tell you that there would be no reduction, in my opinion, in sugar. Take all the beet sugar off the market and see how quickly the New York refiners and Philadelphia refiners will raise the price of sugar. I have had charts here showing exactly what changes were made, and the exact dates, when there was no domestic sugar to sell. They put on whatever price they wanted to. It is one commodity, handled by about seven concerns of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, if we did not have the scarlet fever, we would have the measles.

Mr. SMOOT. I think you would have both scarlet fever and measles with no local production of sugar.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me ask the Senator another question. One dollar and seventy-six cents a hundred is the figure?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the imposition of that duty add anything to the cost of sugar when we buy it?

Mr. SMOOT. When who buys it?

Mr. COPELAND. When an American citizen buys it.

Mr. SMOOT. The consumer?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it does.

Mr. COPELAND. How much does that add in the course of a year—the aggregate amount?

Mr. SMOOT. Do you mean what duty is paid?

Mr. COPELAND. What is the added sugar bill of the Nation by reason of the duty?

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody could tell that.

Mr. COPELAND. Two hundred and fifty million dollars, probably.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says "probably."

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. Is not that about right?

Mr. SMOOT. I should think it would be the amount of the duty collected, whatever it was.

Mr. COPELAND. Let us say $200,000,000. Is that right?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked up the latest figures. It is a large amount.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator says it is a large amount. Let me say for the comfort of the Senator from Utah that I am with him for a reasonable tariff on sugar, but I am attempting to point out what is the fact, and the thing which he has admitted, that by reason of this tariff the people of this country pay a tremendous amount of money which they would not pay without it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator goes too far there. If there were no such duty, the people would have to raise that amount of money from some other source, and they would pay it. The tax that is raised from the sugar imported into this country goes a long way toward paying the expenses of the Government; that is, to the extent of about $200,000,000. If sugar came in free, the American people would have to make up what is now collected as duty. There is no doubt about that. So it is a question whether the duty shall be on a commodity produced in the United States, with United States capital, United States labor, paying the farmer the highest price that has been paid for years.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, for sugar beets?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator tell the Senate and the country how much revenue the country receives from the sugar made from sugar beets?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no tax upon it, and that is a very little part of what they consume.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, in order that we may protect this very little part, we put a tariff of $1.76 a hundred, to increase the price 2 or 3 cents a pound on every pound of sugar purchased in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. That is not so, Mr. President. There is no 2 or 3 cents a pound.

Mr. COPELAND. One dollar and seventy-six cents a hundred is 1.76 cents?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but it is not 2 or 3 cents.

Mr. COPELAND. When the consumer goes to buy, how much is it, then? It is pyramided, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No. That is one commodity sold in the United States with hardly a cent of profit in it. It is almost like changing dollars.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will be kind enough to yield to me, I would like to make the explanation a little clearer.

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The consumption of sugar per capita in the United States is about 200 pounds. Of that, 30 pounds is bought directly as sugar by the consumer for human consumption. One hundred and seventy pounds enter into the manufacture of thousands of articles, where the duty plays no part in the fixing of the price. So that when you come here to demonstrate the case you are trying to make, you base it on 30 pounds per capita. Then, if it is found that the consumer pays all of that tariff on 30 pounds, the total is that multiplied by the people of the United States.

No one would assert that when he buys a plug of tobacco or when he buys a ham or smoked meat or ice cream or candy or sugar or other articles, where sugar is merely incidental, that the tariff on that sugar at the rate of $1.76 per hundred pounds enters into the cost to the consumer.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the tariff on tobacco enter into it?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Of course it does; very much more so.

Mr. COPELAND. Because there is more tobacco than there is sugar?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes. The quantity of sugar is so small there that you can not estimate it. You go and buy a stick of gum for 5 cents. If there were no sugar in that gum, it would still cost you 5 cents, or if there were twice as much sugar in it, it would still cost you 5 cents. If you cut it in half, you would have to pay the same price. It is so infinitesimal that it plays no part.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Louisiana seems to be at cross purposes with the Senator from Utah. The Senator from Utah has just confessed that by reason of this tariff on sugar we are paying $200,000,000 more for sugar than we would otherwise.

Mr. SMOOT. On the importation.

Mr. COPELAND. However, the fact remains, whether we call it $250,000,000, or $200,000,000, or $100,000,000, or $50,000,000, that the tariff on sugar causes the farmer to pay more for sugar than he otherwise would pay.

Mr. President, there is another matter that enters into the welfare of the farmer. Whenever any one of us favors a farm relief bill, we are told that such a bill is violative of economic law, that it violates the law of supply and demand, and therefore that we must not pass any such unscientific thing because it is uneconomic.

Can anything be more uneconomic, any more violative of the law of supply and demand, than a protective tariff? That is the purpose of the tariff. The main purpose of the protective tariff is not to raise revenue; the main purpose is to protect American industry, and in order that there may be protection of industry, the tariff is set up to raise the threshhold and make it impossible for foreigners to compete with our home-made products.

Therefore, when these farm Senators come here and talk to us about the necessity of the one-crop farmer, why do we raise the cry against them, "This is uneconomic, this is violative of the law of supply and demand"? It is no more uneconomic and no more violative of natural law than the protective tariff system is.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. McMASTER. I desire to modify and perfect Senate Resolution 52, which is now pending for consideration before the Senate. I desire to strike out all after the first word, "Resolved," and substitute in lieu thereof the following language, so that the resolution then would read:

Resolved, That many of the rates in the existing tariff schedules are excessive, that the Senate favors immediate revision downward of such schedules, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all; be it further

Resolved, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, will not the Senator further perfect or modify—I think it would be perfecting the resolution—by setting forth that whereas certain of the rates of duty now imposed under existing law are too low, not adequately protective, they should be raised so as to give effective protection to the vast variety of agricultural products?

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from California will carefully read this resolution he will discover that it contains exactly that provision, stating that it is to the end that there shall be established a closer parity between agriculture and industry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have heard that phrase very often and the more frequently I hear it the less I understand it. But the Senator has, within his rights, I take it, proposed to amend his original proposed resolution, and he has recited that whereas certain rates are too high, and so forth. Now, I am asking him whether he does not agree with me that many of them are too low and should be raised. If his resolution is amended to cover that proposition some now opposed might join him and vote for its passage.

Mr. McMASTER. I have not any doubt, Mr. President, that if I should revise the resolution so as to provide that there should be a revision and a revision upward, we would get the solid vote of this side of the Chamber excepting the votes of those who favor agriculture. I have no question about that at all.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I hope the Senator is right in his statement.

Mr. McMASTER. I think that if any Senator who is interested in agriculture will carefully read the resolution he will decide that he can vote for it, for if that resolution is passed and is ultimately translated into law agriculture in this country will receive a distinct benefit, and furthermore, under the resolution if there is any tariff schedule on agricultural products that should be raised, it can be raised, and I believe there are agricultural schedules which should be raised.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad to yield, because I like to see a row on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is not a row, nor a riot, nor a Democratic gathering.

Mr. COPELAND. I would recognize the last one, being familiar with it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was prompted by the Senator's courtesy to make the inquiry of my friend from South Dakota, because I think there are many items in the tariff law which should be further protected by the raising of duties imposed. I could cite a number. I think there are some products in South Dakota which need further tariff protection. I know of a very considerable number of agricultural products of California which need further protection. I further know that there is not a Democratic farmer in California who does not heartily join with his Republican neighbor in sustaining what I say and who will not sustain what I say. So, with all seriousness and not to delay the discussion further, I am hopeful still, for I am a very hopeful man, that the resolution may in terms refer to the inadequately low rates as well as to the alleged inadequately high rates.

Mr. McMASTER. If the resolution should be modified so that it would meet with the requirements of the Senator, namely, that he is desirous of raising the rates on agricultural products and that he wants to lower a number of rates on industrial products, would he vote for the resolution?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would not at this time.

Mr. McMASTER. And so it goes with all those who are opposed to the resolution. It does not make any difference what language is put in the resolution, they will vote against it. They simply try to throw dust and cloud the issue, misconstrue its meaning, and find fault in general.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have no right to pursue the matter longer; but what good would be accomplished by the passage of the resolution?

Mr. COPELAND. Do not let me at all interfere with the discussion. Now, may we have the clerk report the resolution as modified, and then I will resume?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). The resolution as modified will be read.

The legislative clerk read the modified resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That many of the rates in existing tariff schedules are excessive, and that the Senate favors an immediate revision downward of such schedules, establishing a closer parity between agriculture and industry, believing it will result to the general benefit of all; be it further

Resolved, That such tariff revision should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume the Senator from South Dakota intends to point out that there are certain schedules which are too high and that such schedules should be lowered?

Mr. McMASTER. I think that is in the resolution.

Mr. COPELAND. Is that the intention of the Senator?

Mr. McMASTER. I have gone into my interpretation of the import and the meaning of the former resolution, and the modified resolution has been explained many times on the floor of the Senate. I think there are many, many industrial schedules which are exorbitant, which are excessive, which are outrageous, and that those schedules ought to be lowered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before this interesting colloquy on the other side of the aisle this situation which shows the fraternal love existing across the aisle, I had stated that in my judgment any tariff law violates economic laws.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, speaking about fraternal love, possibly after the Jackson Day dinner we will know more about it.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say to the Senator that I am praying all the time that we may have such a harmonious meeting as the interests of the country demand we should have, and that out of that will grow a situation which will make possible the election of a Democratic President, which will benefit the country materially.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator that there should be such a meeting as will help the country.

Mr. COPELAND. We are as one in that matter. Are there any other comments at this moment across the aisle?

Mr. FESS. "The prayer of the wicked availeth nothing," is the only comment I wish to make at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. But the prayer of the righteous availeth much.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator have the goodness now to tell us the name of the nominee?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly. I shall be glad to name the nominee. The governor of my State, Alfred E. Smith, will sweep the country, and if he is nominated for President it does not make any difference what the gentlemen across the aisle do, he will be elected. [Laughter.] Is that all?

Mr. BORAH. No; that is not all. What is the position of Governor Smith on the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. Has the Senator from Idaho forgotten how to read the English language?

Mr. BORAH. No; but I was unable to construe it to my satisfaction. I am asking the Senator from New York now, who speaks for Governor Smith, what is his position?

Mr. COPELAND. I have no right to say I speak for Governor Smith. I do not speak for Governor Smith. Governor Smith at no time has announced himself to be a candidate for this high office. But I know enough about Governor Smith to know how he feels about the eighteenth amendment. He has said that the eighteenth amendment prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, but the Volstead Act prohibits not only the sale of intoxicating liquors but it prohibits the sale of nonintoxicating liquors. I conclude that he believes, as I do, that the Volstead Act goes far beyond the spirit and letter of the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Then I understand the position of Governor Smith is that he is in favor of the eighteenth amendment but opposed to the Volstead Act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Smith has said time and time again that the Volstead Act should be modified to permit a beverage of higher alcoholic content, but within the limits of the eighteenth amendment. Regardless of whether Mr. Smith believes the Volstead Act is a proper act, Mr. Smith believes that that law and every other law while upon the statute books must be strictly enforced. The enforcement in my State has been by the State police under Governor Smith.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the position of Governor Smith as interpreted by the Senator from New York, it is that he is in favor of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I will say that Governor Smith at no time has said that the eighteenth amendment should not be enforced.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand he is in favor of it?

Mr. COPELAND. I could not answer for Governor Smith in that particular matter.

Mr. BORAH. He is in favor of a strict enforcement of it, however?

Mr. COPELAND. He certainly is.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator know whether or not he favors leaving to the States the proposition of determining what is the alcoholic content under the Constitution?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. I quote from the 1927 message of Governor Smith to the New York Legislature:

I believe that the duty now rests upon the legislature to pass suitable resolutions conveying in a formal manner the result of that vote to the Congress of the United States and memorializing it on behalf of the State of New York to enact at the earliest possible moment a sane, sensible, reasonable definition of what constitutes an intoxicant under the eighteenth amendment, so that harmless beverages which our people have enjoyed for more than a century may be restored to them.

In the meantime, however, it must be borne in mind that until such modification is effective the Federal statute and the eighteenth amendment are just as much the law of this State as any of our own State statutes. This has been definitely settled by a decision of the United States Supreme Court. I again warn sheriffs and peace officers generally that it is their sworn duty to enforce these laws. Failure to perform this duty I will consider as serious an offense as a failure to obey the State statutes, and when laid before me, substantiated by proper and competent testimony, I will exercise without fear or favor the power of removal wherever it is vested in me.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but the governor is in favor of each State determining for itself what the alcoholic content shall be?

Mr. COPELAND. The governor, as I interpret his view, is in favor of having Congress determine what is the alcoholic content which is the limit of nonintoxication and that the State, by affirmative vote of its own citizens, shall determine whether it prefers its liquor of an alcoholic content above one-half of 1 per cent but not in excess of that which is determined by Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Then I understand the governor is in favor of Congress, and not the States, fixing the alcoholic content?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; within the limits of the modified act, is his position, as I understand it.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator sure about that?

Mr. COPELAND. I think I am right about it.

Mr. BORAH. Then I have misread his record.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course the Senator has misread his message, and many other Senators have misread his message; and many citizens of this country and many Democrats, even, in the country fail to understand Mr. Smith's attitude. If Mr. Smith is elected President of the United States, as I believe he will be, there will never have been in that office a man who has more strictly and thoroughly and unfailingly insisted upon law enforcement than Alfred E. Smith.

Mr. BORAH. Then in order that I may understand, because I am seeking information, let me inquire further. Since the Senator raised the question about Governor Smith being a candidate, I became interested, of course, and especially after he stated he would be elected. I understand the position of Governor Smith is that he is thoroughly in favor of enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. That as Chief Executive he will exert all the powers in his control to enforce the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. That he is not in favor of the States fixing the alcoholic content but that he is in favor of Congress fixing the content?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; as I interpret his views.

Mr. BORAH. Then what is the difference between his position and the position which we now occupy under those two laws? Congress has already fixed the alcoholic content.

Mr. COPELAND. Which is——

Mr. BORAH. I know what it is, but the Senator said the governor is in favor of Congress fixing it, and if that is true he must accept what Congress fixes.

Mr. COPELAND. And he has accepted it.

Mr. BORAH. Then if he is in favor of Congress fixing it and Congress fixes it at what it is now, would the governor stand for what Congress does?

Mr. COPELAND. He certainly would—that is his sworn duty.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. COPELAND. And under no circumstances and at no time has he said that he wished to violate or nullify the law enacted by Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I am not charging anything against Governor Smith at all. I have a very fine riding horse which bears his name and I am made to think of him every morning. I am not attacking, but seeking information.

Mr. COPELAND. And the more the Senator is with his horse the better he thinks of humanity.

Mr. BORAH. Sometimes that is true; but I understood the governor to be in favor of each State fixing the alcoholic content, and that is the reason why he supported a referendum in New York. The referendum in New York provided that the alcoholic content was to be in accordance with the declaration or position taken by each State. Governor Smith signed it and supported it. Do I understand that he has receded from that position?

Mr. COPELAND. No; he has not changed his position. I have no reason to doubt that he holds to the opinion he expressed at the time of the Mullan-Gage repeal. I quote:

> It seems to me that common sense, backed up by good medical opinion, can find a more scientific definition of what constitutes an intoxicating beverage. Such a definition should be adopted by Congress as a proper and reasonable amendment of the Volstead Act and a maximum alcoholic content should be prescribed by Congress which would limit all States to the traffic in liquors which are, in fact, nonintoxicating within the meaning of the eighteenth amendment.
> Subject to that limitation each State should therefore be left free to determine for itself what should constitute an intoxicating beverage. States which then wish to limit traffic to beverages containing not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol would be free to do so and those which desire to extend the traffic to the maximum limitation allowed by Federal statute would be equally free to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Then he still holds to the doctrine which was announced in the New York referendum?

Mr. COPELAND. May I state once more for the benefit of the Senator that in common with many other citizens, and I am one of them, the governor of my State believes that when the Volstead Act was passed it fixed an alcoholic content far below an alcoholic content which is truly intoxicating. I have heard eminent citizens, Members of this body——

Mr. BORAH. Let us stop right there.

Mr. COPELAND. All right.

Mr. BORAH. The Congress did fix that alcoholic content.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; it did.

Mr. BORAH. And the governor, the Senator said, is in favor of Congress fixing the alcoholic content?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Then, why is he not satisfied with what Congress did?

Mr. COPELAND. The governor, in a very recent statement, said that if a citizen or any group of citizens became dissatisfied with the law that citizen or that group of citizens would have a perfect right to find fault with it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course.

Mr. COPELAND. And that is what he has done.

Mr. BORAH. Then he is not in favor of the alcoholic content as fixed by the Congress.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator mean Governor Smith indorses an alcoholic content which is intoxicating?

Mr. BORAH. I think that it is important whether we are in favor of Congress fixing the alcoholic content, or in favor of each State fixing it, as the New York referendum provided. To be candid, I understand Governor Smith's position to be that each State should fix the alcoholic content to suit itself. But the Senator states that his understanding is that Governor Smith is in favor of Congress fixing the alcoholic content. If that be true, he must be satisfied with what Congress did, and Congress has fixed the alcoholic content that is found in the Volstead Act.

Mr. COPELAND. When the Senator said he is satisfied, does that mean that he must never under any circumstances find fault with it or seek to modify the law?

Mr. BORAH. He could not modify the proposition as to whether or not Congress was to fix it. He might ask Congress to fix it higher or lower. But the question is, Who is to fix the content—Congress or the States?

Mr. COPELAND. That is what he is asking for.

Mr. BORAH. But does he propose to leave it to Congress ultimately to fix the alcoholic content?

Mr. COPELAND. I so understand.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. NEELY. The distinguished Senator from Idaho has asked the able Senator from New York to state the attitude of an alleged candidate for President on the Democratic ticket toward the eighteenth amendment. I ask the wise and courageous Republican Senator from Idaho to state the position of his party's President on the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if anybody ever announces his candidacy for the Republican nomination, I am going to ask him. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator believe that he could obtain a responsive answer from the present incumbent?

Mr. BORAH. The present occupant of the chair?

Mr. NEELY. No; the present occupant of the White House.

Mr. BORAH. If I should ask him what?

Mr. NEELY. If the Senator should ask him about his position on the eighteenth amendment, does he believe that he would receive a responsive answer?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. What would that answer be?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator has no idea?

Mr. BORAH. I have no idea.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, what causes the Senator to have so much faith that he would ever get an answer? Nobody else has been able to get one out of him.

Mr. BORAH. I think the President would answer it if I should ask the question, but I do not know what his answer would be.

Mr. CARAWAY. The country has asked him that question over and over again, and if the Senator has so much more influence than all the rest of the country, why did he not come to the country's relief and ask the President?

Mr. BORAH. I did not know the country had asked the President that question.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator did not know the country had asked the President that question? Practically every group in the country has asked it; has asked whether he was going to enforce the law or not enforce it.

Mr. BORAH. My observation has been that organizations which purport particularly to speak for the eighteenth amendment have almost universally supposed that they understood the President's position.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was that position?

Mr. BORAH. For the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. NEELY. For enforcement under Mr. Mellon?

Mr. CARAWAY. They appeared to be satisfied with it, did they?

Mr. BORAH. I did not say they had been satisfied.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who has been satisfied; I am curious to know.

Mr. BORAH. I assume that all these organizations have been satisfied, because they have passed resolutions indorsing the President's attitude.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have read the newspapers very carefully, but I did not know that.

Mr. BORAH. I happened to be present at one of the meetings where they passed resolutions indorsing his position.

Mr. CARAWAY. Were they unanimously passed?

Mr. BORAH. They were unanimously passed.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator, then, concurred in them?

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator was present and he says the action was unanimous.

Mr. BORAH. I was speaking before the organization; I was not a member of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, the Senator was merely the voice of the organization, and not a member of it.

Mr. BORAH. I was speaking my own views.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the organization did not agree with the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator did not agree with the organization?

Mr. BORAH. They did not indorse me. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho know the position of Mr. Hoover or Mr. Lowden on the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know the position of a single candidate for the Republican nomination for the Presidency on this question.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator knows the position of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], does he not?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not; but if I live and keep my health and by respectful inquiry can ascertain before the next Republican convention, I shall ascertain what their positions are.

Mr. COPELAND. And then, if the candidate does not give a satisfactory reply, since the Senator knows what Governor Smith stands for, he will vote for him?

Mr. BORAH. For Smith?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If I have no better success in finding out from Governor Smith what his position is than I have had in finding out from the Senator from New York what his position is, I shall not be able to vote for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Idaho has inquired about a possible Democratic candidate's position on the eighteenth amendment. Why does he not submit a similar inquiry to some of the many prospective Republican candidates—particularly to the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who now sits within 8 feet of the Senator from Idaho, and to the stalwart Senator from Ohio who usually sits only a little farther away?

Mr. CARAWAY. Which Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NEELY. I refer to the one who is supposed to be a candidate for President [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. CARAWAY. There is a candidate sitting right back of the Senator from Idaho. If he can not find out his sentiments, he can at least ask him.

The Senator from Idaho said he did not know the position of any candidate.

Mr. BORAH. I do not even know who the candidates are.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then let us take a day off and name some of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from New York stated on the floor that the Governor of New York would be the nominee of the Democratic ticket and that he would be elected. I rose in my place within a few minutes after that announcement and asked the question which I will ask of every Republican candidate when the same thing takes place. There have been a number of Senators on the Republican side, practically half of the Senate, whose names have been mentioned in connection with the presidential nomination, but there has been no announcement of their candidacy so far as I know. Whenever, however, there is such an announcement, upon this floor or elsewhere, I propose to ask the question.

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator will read the newspapers, because at least two Senators sitting on his side of the Chamber have had their hats in the ring and advertised the fact that they had put them in the ring some weeks ago. They ought to be at least recognized as candidates by Members of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. The Senator can be assured that these questions will be asked of them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let us ask them right now. There are at least two of them present. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. There is no better interrogator in the Senate than is the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not pretend to speak for the Republican side because I never have been able to know exactly what the Republican Party stood for. I never dreamed that anybody knew where the present administration stood upon the question of prohibition. The Senator has assured me for the first time that some group of which he was the spokesman or before whom he spoke had actually declared that they were satisfied with what the President was doing on the question of prohibition, but I have never seen any reference to that action.

Mr. BORAH. I will bring it to the Senator to-morrow.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not question the Senator's word, but it got so little publicity that I did not see it.

Mr. BORAH. No; it did not get a little publicity; it got entirely too much publicity, it seemed to me.

Mr. CARAWAY. I really had thought that the present administration was proceeding upon the theory that the "drys" had all the law they wanted and the "wets" had all the liquor they wanted. That has been my understanding of the present administration's attitude.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. For instance, if the very dearly beloved Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] or if Mr. Hoover should become the Republican nominee for President, and the Senator should receive an answer to his inquiry about such nominee's position on the eighteenth amendment will he not be good enough also to ask the candidate if, in the event of his election, he purposes to appoint an ex-distiller or an ex-brewer Secretary of the Treasury, to supervise the enforcement of the prohibition amendment?

Mr. BORAH. That will be a very pertinent question, and I am glad the Senator from West Virginia has suggested it; I shall remember it.

Mr. COPELAND. Now, Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho. I attempted to give him an answer and an honest answer to his question. He is not satisfied with my answer. He has said, however, that no matter who may be nominated by the Republicans he is going to ask this question of him: "Where do you stand on the eighteenth amendment and where do you stand on the Volstead Act?"

Mr. BORAH. Who is going to ask that question—I?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Idaho is going to ask the nominee of his party that question. The Senator from Idaho will say to the nominee of the Republican Party, "Where do you stand on the eighteenth amendment? Where do you stand on the Volstead Act? Would you under any circumstances believe in its modification?" Suppose the answer is not a satisfactory one, will the Senator from Idaho refuse to support that man for election as the Republican candidate of his party?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Republican Party shall nominate a man for the Presidency of the United States who is not in favor of enforcing the eighteenth amendment and of standing by the Constitution as it is written, I am not going to support him.

Mr. COPELAND. Then in that case the Senator can support the candidate I have mentioned, because he is in favor of enforcing the eighteenth amendment and of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I do not want to commit myself to the interpretation which has been placed upon his views by the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that the Senator from Idaho will put his own interpretation upon any answer given by the Republican nominee.

Mr. BORAH. Since the Senator from New York has raised that question, I will say that I recall that when Mr. Smith became Governor of New York there was upon the statute books of the State of New York a law enacted for the purpose of carrying into effect the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, which committed the State of New York to cooperation with the National Government for the purpose of enforcing the eighteenth amendment. I undertake to say that the eighteenth amendment can not be enforced in any State where the State itself through its officials does not cooperate with the National Government for its enforcement. There is not any intelligent man who does not know that the law can not be maintained and enforced without the aid of the States.

The State of New York repealed that law; the Governor of New York signed the repeal, and thereby took away the support of the State of New York from the Constitution of the United States, in this particular.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to deny in set terms that that is the situation, and I do so with all respect to the Senator from Idaho. I remember that the Senator from Idaho and I had a colloquy on this subject last year or the year before, and I shall now repeat in effect what I then said.

In the first place, I want to say that the State enforcement act, the Mullan-Gage Act, could never have been repealed except by Republican votes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I perfectly agree to that statement, but if Governor Smith had vetoed that repeal the law would have now been on the statute books.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; I concede that, and I told the Senator from Idaho last year or the year before what Governor Smith believed about it and what he said about it when he filed his approval of that repeal. He filed with it a memorandum, and any man who reads the English language can understand it. He said he favored the repeal because it created that un-American situation which we call "double jeopardy"; but at the time that he filed that memorandum, in it, in words as plain as man could write, he said:

Let me say what the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law will not do.

Its repeal will not make legal a single act which was illegal during the period of the existence of the statute.

Many communications I have received and arguments that have been made to me indicate a belief that its repeal will make possible the manufacture, sale, and distribution of light wines and beer. So far as that is concerned it will still be under the control it is to-day, subject to the provisions of the Volstead Act. Repeal of the Mullan-Gage law will not bring back light wines and beer.

The Supreme Court of the United States said:

"The Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are as much the part of the law of every State as its own local laws and constitution."

That means that after repeal there will still rest upon the peace officers of this State the sacred responsibility of sustaining the Volstead Act with as much force and as much vigor as they would enforce any State law or local ordinance, and I shall expect the discharge of that duty in the fullest measure by every peace officer in the State. The only difference after repeal is that to-day the police officer may take the offender for prosecution to the State court, to the Federal court, or to both. After the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law the prosecution must be where it belongs—in the Federal court. In law and in fact there is no more lawlessness in repealing the Mullan-Gage law than there is in the failure of the State to pass statutes making it a State crime to violate any other Federal penal statute.

Let it be understood at once and for all that this repeal does not in the slightest degree lessen the obligation of peace officers of the State to enforce in its strictest letter the Volstead Act and warning to that effect is herein contained as coming from the chief executive of the State of New York.

At this point, with all the earnestness that I am able to bring to my command, let me assure the thousands of people who wrote to me on this subject, and the citizens of the State generally, that the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law will not and can not by any possible stretch of the imagination bring back into existence the saloon, which is and ought to be a defunct institution in this country, and any attempt at its reestablishment by a misconstruction of the executive attitude on this bill will be forcefully and vigorously suppressed.

Let me now say what the repeal of the Mullan-Gage law will do.

Its repeal will do away entirely with the possibility of double jeopardy for violation of the laws enforcing the eighteenth amendment. By that we mean that no citizen shall be twice punished for the one offense. Under the United States Supreme Court decision in the Lanza case a citizen is to-day subjected to double trial and even to double punishment for a single offense, because such alleged offense is a violation of both the State and the Federal law. This is an unwarranted and indefensible exception to the fundamental constitutional guaranty contained in both the Federal and State Constitutions that no person shall be twice tried or punished for the same offense.

Mr. President, to repeat what I said a few months ago, practically the only effective control of the liquor business in the State of New York, either before the repeal of the Mullan-Gage Act or since, has been by the State officials. The seizure of plants, of stills, of bootleggers, has been to a great extent the work of the State police. It is not fair by direct word or by implication to accuse Mr. Smith of any lack of zeal in the enforcement of the Volstead Act, in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, or in the enforcement of the Constitution of the United States.

Those of us who know Mr. Smith know how devoted he is to the enforcement of law, how consistent he has been in his upholding of the Constitution. Therefore I say it is not fair, either by direct statement or by implication, to accuse this great governor, who is beloved by the people of my State, and I think equally beloved by the people of the United States. While we got into this discussion facetiously in the first place, in my judgment when the people of the United States come to understand this man there is not any question about what will happen when he is nominated for the Presidency, and I believe he will be elected President of the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I observe that the subject of the eighteenth amendment has been introduced. I assume it is meant by "the eighteenth amendment" to imply that that means prohibition.

I did not know that there was anyone so innocent as to entertain the opinion that there is any such thing as prohibition in fact; nor do I know that there is anyone who entertains the opinion that the eighteenth amendment has any effective enforcement anywhere outside of those who conscientiously believe in abstaining from the use of intoxicating liquors. So this talk about Governor Smith's position on the eighteenth amendment raises the direct question, How can any State in the Union cooperate with a Federal Prohibition Department that has been corrupt, that has been rotten to the core, many members of which have served or are serving terms in penitentiaries for the violation of the very law they have taken their oath to support?

When a prominent member of the Federal Prohibition Department only recently—I think it was Mr. Lowman—said that in the Prohibition Department corruption and graft still exist, how can any self-respecting State or governor offer cooperation to an organization that has been and is to-day honeycombed with graft and corruption?

I believe the discussion of this so-called prohibition question is beside the mark and outside of the question under discussion. Therefore I want to ask the Senator from New York, What is Governor Smith's position upon the tariff question with respect to relieving the farmers of this country, who, because of their economic enslavement, are leaving the farms by the hundreds of thousands each year? Will the Senator kindly inform us?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Wisconsin. Perhaps we have gone far enough with this prohibition discussion. The Senator from Wisconsin has just retired from the governorship of a Republican State—a Republican State where, I believe, they have an enforcement law. He says prohibition can not be enforced. There are other States governed by Republicans, and, so far as my observation goes, there is not any State in the Union where prohibition is being enforced. It is not fair to say that it is due to this man or that man, and probably it is not fair to say of the President of the United States that it is his fault.

Now, however, the Senator from Wisconsin has asked me a question about the attitude of the governor of my State regarding agriculture. I should like to quote from the governor in one of his recent messages. This is what he said:

> Any conception of the State as serving the people which omitted consideration for our basic industry of agriculture, and the great public works which will contribute to the solution of our problems of transportation and cost of living, would be unsound.

Then on another occasion he said in another message:

> The present condition of agriculture in our State is such that it requires relief at the earliest possible moment. Since the harvest of 1920 conditions have grown steadily worse, until from every section of the State reports are coming that farmers by the hundred are giving up farming and many are selling out and flocking to the industrial centers, already overcrowded.

I am glad to say that the governor of my State has a very vivid realization of the necessity of some form of farm relief.

To go back to the main discussion, I had spoken of the tariff law as violative of economic law. It is unsound, economically considered, from the standpoint of the science of economics; and the farmer is largely the victim of it, because the farmer is a large consumer.

Where do you think the manufactured steel of this country is used? In 1926 the United States Steel Corporation made a profit of $199,000,000, and the other steel corporations made large sums. The total profits on steel last year were over $300,000,000. Where did the steel go? Who bought it?

Over half the steel used in the United States is sold on the farm in the form of agricultural implements, fence wire, plowshares, hammers, axes, chains, crowbars, harness buckles, and so forth. You know the multitude of things used on the farm that are made from steel. Over half the steel consumed in this country is consumed on the farm. If you impair the buying power of the farmer, every manufacturing industry in this country is bound to suffer.

Not only is the farmer the victim of the uneconomic tariff law, and required to pay tremendous increases over real values by reason of the tariff law, but he is the victim of another violation of economic law. I refer now to the labor union; and I say of that, as I did of the tariff, that I would not have the labor union destroyed. When I was a boy the workmen on the railroad section in my village got a dollar a day. That is all they had, and they worked 12 hours. Laborers started out in early life and at the end of a short career they were still laborers; and the children of laborers were laborers.

It was not until the labor union came along, and these men were able to deal with their problem collectively, that they had any relief; and I would not for a moment do one thing to impair the usefulness or the vitality of the labor unions. But out of their organization has grown the fixing of prices for labor. The carpenter, the plumber, the mason, and all others engaged in the crafts have practically a fixed price; and, Mr. President, who can doubt that that is violative of economic law, of the law of supply and demand? The farmer, when he wants to hire somebody to work on the farm, has to compete with the high prices of the near-by village or city. His boys are attracted by the high prices of the crafts, and they go into the city. So the farmer is the victim of the fixing of prices there. Why should not the farmer, too, have some part in the benefits of protection?

Mr. President, we have been detained so long that I do not like to go into the details that I wanted to present. I think the discussion perhaps has been much more profitable by reason of the course it did take this afternoon. I think even the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is converted, and will vote the Democratic ticket next year; but I do want to refer to at least one item in this "tariff of abominations."

In order to save time, I send to the desk a letter and ask that it be printed in my remarks at this point. It is a letter from an independent manufacturer of aluminum, pointing out that by reason of the tariff upon aluminum it is only the great Aluminum Trust that can hope to make utensils and other products of aluminum. I had intended to comment upon that, but time does not permit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, December 15, 1927.

The Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I duly received your letter of December 3 in regard to the aluminum tariff.

I am glad to see that you appreciate the necessity of protecting the fabricators of aluminum ware, who require this protection and I might say that there are any number of independent fabricators who by reason of low labor costs on the other side need a certain amount of protection. On the other hand, the raw material as I wrote you is too highly protected, for which there is no necessity under prevailing conditions. The aluminum metal can probably be produced as cheaply in this country as anywhere else, which is further proven by the fact that the domestic producer has gone to Canada and Norway for additional water power and is producing metal in those countries.

Under the Wilson administration the rates of duty were as follows:

	Cents per pound
Crude aluminum	2
Semimanufactured forms	3½

The present tariff act contains the following provision under paragraph No. 374:

"Aluminum, aluminum scrap, and alloys of any kind in which aluminum is the component material of chief value, in crude form, 5 cents per pound; in coils, plates, sheets, bars, rods, circles, disks, blanks, strips, rectangles, and squares, 9 cents per pound."

As you see, therefore, there has been an increase from 2 cents to 5 cents on the raw material, and an increase from 3½ cents to 9 cents on semimanufactured forms, which is prohibitive.

The raw material is stil being brought in, but, as a 5-cent duty has to be added to the importer's price, the fabricator in this country is penalized to that extent.

In importing raw materials from the other side it is customary to insert a duty clause in the contract, so that if there is a change either up or down, it is for buyer's account; thus if the duty was reduced the buyer would immediately get the benefit. I believe that the time has come to take off the duty altogether, and that therefore—

"Aluminum, aluminum scrap, and alloys of all kinds in which aluminum is the component material of chief value in crude form" should come in free.

On this basis semimanufactured forms, including—

"Coils, plates, sheets, bars, rods, circles, disks, blanks, strips, rectangles, and squares" might be assessed 2 cents per pound.

If it is impossible at this time to put this proposition through, the very least that should be done is the reinstating of the rates under the Wilson administration of 2 cents and 3½ cents, respectively; but I still maintain that with the changes which have taken place as to production methods, coupled with the fact that the home industry has gone abroad for a large part of its production should fully justify the free listing of the raw material, as mentioned above.

I repeat again that the many independent foundries making parts of automobiles, washing machines, vacuum cleaners, and other household appliances; also the many makers of kitchen utensils would be distinctly benefited by a lower cost on this raw material, which is the chief metal used in their production, and the saving which would immediately follow should promptly be passed on to the public in its purchases of the many articles into which aluminum is fabricated.

If I can be of any further assistance, or if you require any additional information, I shall be very glad to furnish it.

Mr. COPELAND. When we discuss aluminum, however, I want to call the attention of Senators to paragraph 339 of the tariff act of 1922, found on page 25. This says that table, household, kitchen, and hospital utensils and hollow or flatware not specially provided for, composed wholly or in chief part of aluminum, shall be taxed 11 cents per pound and 55 per cent ad valorem.

Sometimes a homely illustration will bring home the significance of one of the dry paragraphs of this tariff act, and perhaps make more impressive what the law means to the average citizen.

A couple of years ago Mrs. Copeland desired to make some preserves at our house on the farm. She did not have a preserving pot big enough to accomplish what she had in mind. So she went down to the village and came back with a great, big, shiny aluminum drum. To me it looked like a very expensive and formidable utensil. I inquired from her how much she paid for it. Her reply was $4.55.

I said, "Just for fun let's find out how much you paid for the aluminum pot, and how much you paid to Mr. Mellon." So we took this aluminum utensil to the scales where she weighs herself every morning to see if she has gained any, and we found that it weighed 3 pounds. Aluminum being very light, you can see that that was quite a formidable outfit.

We looked up this paragraph 339 to find out what the tariff is on such a piece of kitchen hardware, and found that the tariff is 11 cents a pound. The pot weighed 3 pounds. Three times 11 is 33 cents. Then there was a duty of 55 per cent ad valorem, 55 per cent on the value.

We will suppose that instead of being $4.55 the price was only $3.55. Fifty-five per cent of that would be $1.95. One dollar and ninety-five cents was the ad valorem duty. Three pounds at 11 was 33 cents, which added to $1.95 makes $2.28. The pot cost $4.55. That was $2.27 for the pot and $2.28 for the jackpot, and Mr. Mellon won!

Every time a housewife, every time the wife on the farm, buys an aluminum pot or pan, pie plate, or milk pan, half the price she pays for it is added to the real value. This is an abomination made possible by reason of the protective tariff system.

I want every farm wife in America to understand that the effect of this tariff act is practically to double the prices of utensils used in the kitchen, and that extra amount is not any contribution to the Government. It is money put in the pocket of the aluminum trust, a contribution made possible by the passage of this act. And the same evil runs all through everything bought by the farmer. The Senator from South Dakota the other day gave an extensive list of the added expenses incident to the passage of that tariff act.

What are we going to do about it? We can not blame the farmers for the feeling they have. The situation is a very serious one. I spoke the other day to a farmer back in Michigan, where I was born.

Mr. BORAH. How long ago?

Mr. COPELAND. At a time when the mind of man runneth not to the contrary.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not look it.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is very kind. This man had gone away from his farm to manage one of the cooperative associations.

I asked him how the farmers were getting along. He said, "I will tell you how they are getting along. You know my farm." He has a farm of 160 acres of land. He said, "I left that farm 17 years ago. The taxes on my farm the year I left were $63. To-day they are $242."

I do not want to contend that that is due to the tariff act, or anything we could deal with; but last year the Congress levied $4,000,000,000 in taxes, the States added a billion to the taxes, and the localities five billions. Last year the taxes levied in this country amounted to $10,000,000,000, and the productive earnings of our people, the combined earnings, were only ninety billions. One-ninth of the income of the people of this country was paid in taxes.

That is not all with which the farmer has to contend. The other day the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]—and I am sorry he is not here—spoke about farm implements, and stated that the prices of farm implements were not increased by the tariff. I remember that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] brought in a statement showing how small proportionately the importations of farm implements were to the total number consumed. Does the Senator happen to have those figures in his mind now?

Mr. BLAINE. The importations run about $2,300,000, and the production in the United States of the same farm machinery was a little over $350,000,000, as I remember, or something like that.

Mr. COPELAND. That is it; that is to say, the farmer in the United States bought less than $360,000,000 worth of farm machinery, but of that amount $350,000,000 was manufactured in this country.

The Senator from Maryland brought out this construction of the facts, that the farmer is not affected by those tariff schedules, so far as implements are concerned, and that may be true. But the same elements that have gone into the increase of cost of manufacture of other things, meaning increased labor, increased labor affecting raw materials used in agricultural implements, and so on, have had their effect upon the prices of farm implements. So what has happened in 17 years to bring the matter to the case of this farmer friend of mine in Michigan about whom I spoke?

I insert at this point the following table showing what modern conditions have done to the prices of the implements the farmer must buy:

Implements	1914	1927
Hand corn sheller	$8.00	$17.50
Walking cultivator	18.00	38.00
Riding cultivator	25.00	62.00
1-row lister	36.00	89.50
Sulky plow	40.00	75.00
3-section harrow	18.00	41.00
Corn planter	50.00	83.50
Mowing machine	45.00	95.00
Self-dump hayrake	28.00	55.00
Wagon box	16.00	36.00
Farm wagon	85.00	150.00
Grain drill	85.00	165.00
2-row stalk cutter	45.00	110.00
Grain binder	150.00	225.00
2-row corn disks	38.00	95.00
Walking plow, 14-inch	14.00	28.00
Harness, per set	46.00	75.00

Is the farmer getting any more from the farm than he did? He is not. The farmer to-day gets no more revenue from his farm than he did 17 years ago. His production is bound to pay less because the fertility of the soil is decreasing all the time. Everything the farmer buys is doubled or trebled in price. His taxes have been multiplied four times.

Do you wonder, Mr. President, that the farmers of America are coming here and demanding relief?

I am glad that they have made this attack upon the protective tariff system, not because the attack is going to be effective in actually lowering the tariff schedules, because it probably will not be. There will be a white flag pretty soon. Those who are standing for excessive tariffs will run up the white flag. They will want to have a conference and see what they can do to fix it up. But unless the farmers of this country can find some means of relief, unless there is afforded some way for them to handle their crops, and particularly their surplus, just as sure as that the sun rises and sets there will come a Congress that will tear down the protective tariff system and destroy it utterly.

Mr. President, I do not want that to happen. I come from a great manufacturing State, not alone leading in agricultural products but toward the top, of course, in manufactured products. Perhaps many regard the city of New York as a great financial city. Almost every day somebody makes an attack upon Wall Street. You would think that the only thought of the New Yorker has to do with finance. How many times do you think of New York as a great manufacturing center?

Let me tell you something about New York City. In bulk and value the manufactured products of New York City exceed the combined products of Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Detroit, Buffalo, and Boston. That is what we turn out from the city of New York.

It would be a disaster to us to have the protective tariff destroyed. But there is a greater disaster that can come to us, and that is to have the buying power of the people of this country lowered to such a level that they are not able to buy. We do not use these products we manufacture in New York. They are sold largely to the farmers of the West. The farmers of the West are the great purchasers, as I have said with reference to manufactured steel.

There can be no prosperity in any city of America, or any State of this Union, unless there is prosperity upon the farm. So I honor the Senator from South Dakota for having brought so vividly before the Congress what will happen if there is a real attack made upon the protective tariff system. I congratulate him further because I believe that out of this strategy will come a determination on the part of this Congress to enact some measure of relief for the farmer in order that his buying power may be restored. Agriculture is our basic industry, and unless there is prosperity upon the farm there can be no continued prosperity in any section of this country. We must find some practical means of relieving the distress of the farm people of America.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the tariff record of the Republican Party since its return to control in 1921 demonstrates anew its subservience to privileged wealth and consolidated power. Apparently it gives no heed to the voice of progress or the warnings of history. Apparently it attaches no significance to its reverses of the last decade, and is as indifferent to the lessons of those upheavals as were the Stuarts to the commonwealth or the Bourbons to the first French Republic.

The tariff partnership between the Republican Party and predatory wealth is freighted with infinite peril to this Republic. Our tariff history since the Civil War shows how remorselessly the sheltered interests have controlled the Republican Party. Time after time the American people have cried out for relief from exorbitant tariff taxes. Time after time pretended Republican revisions have occurred, but always with the result that the outrageous Republican tariff rates have substantially remained.

In 1867 Congress directed the Secretary of the Treasury to submit a plan for the reduction of the war tariff. He appointed a widely known expert who prepared a substantial modification of the war duties after careful study both at home and abroad. This modification was indorsed by the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted to Congress in December, 1869. It was rejected by the Republican Congress and the war tariff remained.

In 1870 another simulated revision was made. On noncompeting imports, such as coffee, tea, and spices, rates were reduced, but of competing imports only one was reduced in duty—pig iron. All the war rates with these exceptions were retained.

In 1872 it was found necessary to make another effort to quiet public clamor against the Republican tariff system. The rates on tea and coffee were removed altogether and a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent was made on the other articles. Three years later, however, this small reduction was repealed and the war duties were restored.

In 1882 the popular demand was such that another fraudulent performance was deemed essential. A commission was named to prepare and recommend a scheme of tariff revision, a commission composed of high protectionists. The farce was consummated when the act based on the work of the commission—the tariff act of 1883—was put into operation, an act which kept the tariff virtually at the war level 18 years after hostilities had ceased.

In 1890 the McKinley Tariff Act not only perpetuated the war rates but increased them from 18 to 50 per cent. Unheedful of the overthrow which followed at the polls in the fall of 1890, the protest embodied in the election of a Democratic President in 1892 and of a Democratic House and Senate for the first time since the period preceding the Civil War, taking advantage of the action of the United States Supreme Court in declaring the income-tax section of the Democratic tariff unconstitutional and thereby destroying its fundamental revenue features, the Republican Party, returning to ascendancy, not on the tariff issue but on the issue of the monetary standard, passed in 1897 the Dingley Tariff Act with the tariff duties higher than those of the McKinley tariff law.

Then for 12 years the Republican Party, dominated by the stand-pat philosophy, resisted the mounting tide of public anger against this continuous tariff oppression.

Forced at last to feign another revision, the Republican Party enacted the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act of 1909, which flouted the general desire for tariff reform and left the tariff taxes at a higher general level than they had yet known.

Then followed the loss of the House to the Republicans in 1910, the greater losses of 1912, 1914, and in 1916, the Democratic tariff act, the Underwood-Simmons law of 1913 materially reducing the oppressive duties of 1909, establishing the income tax for the first time as a permanent element of Government revenue, bringing distinct relief to the people yet injuring no legitimate enterprise.

Returning to power in 1918 and 1920 on issues not in any sense connected with the tariff, the Republican Party, ignoring the most evident facts of history, the basic change in America's economic position as a result of the World War, again fell before its idols—the interests it had fondled and nourished at the people's expense for 50 years—and enacted a tariff law, the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, imposing tariff rates equaling and in many instances exceeding those of any previous Republican tariff act, a law enabling favored interests to exact from the American people outrageous charges on many of the things they must possess to maintain a decent standard of living, charges falling with merciless weight on every household in the United States, falling with exceptional severity on the farmers, who must buy most of what they need in an extravagantly protected domestic market and must sell the products of their toil—the great staples of the farm—in competition with the world.

The Republican tariff leopard never changes its spots.

The Democratic Party stands for a tariff law just and fair to all concerned. History demonstrates that the people have always turned to the Democratic Party for proper readjustments in tariff legislation.

During the 67 years from 1861 to 1927 the Democratic Party has had full control of the Government for two short periods—for two years from 1893 to 1895, for six years from 1913 to 1919. In both these periods it adjusted the tariff in such way as to bring relief from excessive rates, and in the latter period, which furnished its first real opportunity in 60 years, it produced a body of legislation that marks the Democratic Party as the chief creative force to which the people must look for the maintenance of the common good. If the tariff is to be satisfactorily readjusted and revised the Democratic Party must be returned to national control.

RUSSELL & TUCKER AND OTHERS

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 620) for the relief of Russell & Tucker and certain other citizens of the States of Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read so that we may know what it is.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I am going to explain what the bill is. It is a bill which confers authority upon certain citizens of Texas to bring suit against the Government for damages sustained by the dipping of certain cattle. A similar bill passed unanimously at the last session.

Mr. WILLIS. Where is the bill now?

Mr. MAYFIELD. It is on the calendar.

Mr. WILLIS. What is the calendar number?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Calendar No. 37. A similar bill passed the Senate unanimously at the last session of Congress.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to have an opportunity to look at the bill.

Mr. MAYFIELD. It simply confers the right on certain citizens to enter suit and have the matter determined by the Federal district court.

Mr. WILLIS. Let us have the bill read.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, just a moment.

Mr. MAYFIELD. If the measure is going to be objected to I am sorry. We could pass it in half a minute. The bill passed the Senate unanimously at the last session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the bill.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Do I understand the reading of the bill was asked for? The measure was referred to the Department of Agriculture and received the approval of the department.

Mr. WILLIS. I am perfectly willing to hear a statement from the Senator in lieu of the reading. I call his attention, however——

Mr. MAYFIELD. It is the same kind of a bill that is usually passed by the Senate conferring the right on citizens to enter suit in the courts against the Government for claims like this one.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the Senator a question. I notice in the report from the Acting Secretary of War that certain amendments are suggested.

Mr. MAYFIELD. They are included in the bill. This is a new bill. The report was made last year on the old bill and when the bill was redrafted and introduced this year it was written to conform with the suggestion of the Department of Agriculture. All of those suggested amendments are in the present bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me invite the attention of the Senator to another matter. I do not know that I shall ultimately object, but I want some information. I note in the report this statement:

> Referred to the Bureau of the Budget, as required by Circular No. 49 of that bureau, and the department under date of April 26 is advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that the legislation contained in S. 4017 and S. 4030, even if amended as suggested in the foregoing, would be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

It seems, therefore, that the matter does not have the full approval of the department. I wish the Senator would let the bill go over temporarily until we have had time to look into it. I probably shall not ultimately object, but I should like to study it a little.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will go over.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 52) submitted by Mr. McMASTER, favoring a reduction of tariff schedules and the consideration of tariff legislation at the present session of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am very heartily in favor of the resolution proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. McMASTER], and I want for just a few moments to give my reasons for voting for the resolution.

In my judgment a tariff law such as we now have is the most unscientific method of taxation known to the taxing laws of government. For the first 125 years of our history practically all of our revenues, or the greater portion of our revenues, were raised, as we all know, by tariff duties, or duties placed on articles imported into our country. Without tariff duties we probably could not have run the Government under our Constitution and laws. It was very early found, however, that the tariff laws affected industry in the country to a tremendous degree, and a system of protection very shortly grew up. Duties were levied for the purpose of helping so-called infant industries, and from small beginnings the system grew and grew until now the levying of duties is not so much for the purpose of raising revenues as it is for the purpose of giving favored interests in our country the protection of bounties or privileges or benefits or bonuses to special interests.

My recollection is that the first tariff law was put into effect in 1789. Its principal purpose at that time was to raise revenue. It was very soon found, however, that it had a tremendous effect upon industry, and it was soon used not only for the purpose of raising revenue but for the purpose of protecting what were then known as infant industries. At first the rates of duty were small, but as the years have gone by since these infant industries have cried out for aid and have continued to receive it at the hands of the Congress.

I said, Mr. President, it was the most unscientific method of taxation known to the Government. I think that can be easily demonstrated. Under the present tariff law, which was enacted in 1922, we have been raising annually—I am using round numbers—from about $500,000,000 to $605,000,000 from customs duties. The actual cost of collecting that money is about the same as the cost of collecting the income taxes which have been levied in accordance with the income tax amendment and the law; but while the two have cost the Government about the same sum to collect, let us see what it has cost the American consuming public to collect the revenue derived from the tariff.

We secure from the customs duties under the tariff laws $605,000,000, but in order to secure that amount of revenue we place an enormous tax burden of $4,000,000,000 upon the American consumer, which goes not to the Government but to favored private interests. The sum of $4,000,000,000—and I am still speaking in round numbers—goes to the favored industries of the country in order to collect only $605,000,000 of revenue for the Government. Can there be imagined, Mr. President, a more unscientific, a more unsatisfactory, a more unjust, a more unfair, a more partial system of taxation than that? Think of it! The Government wants $605,000,000 of revenue, and in order to get that sum has to tax the American consumers $4,000,000,000 more for the benefit of private industry.

Suppose every time a dollar was collected from individual income tax the consuming public had to pay a like bonus to certain interests. In such event it would cost more than five billions of dollars. And suppose every time a dollar of corporation income tax was collected the consuming public had to pay an additional $6 to the favored interests it would cost them over seven billions of dollars. As a matter of fact, the corporate income tax is largely paid by the consumer anyway, but happily for this country the consumer does not have to pay to private interests six or seven times the amount of the tax as in the case of customs duties. A moment's thought indicates that the customs duty is the most unfair of taxes.

Mr. President, so long as it was necessary for our Government to raise that amount of revenue by means of tariff duties, of course, there was an excuse for giving these tremendous bounties, but I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that since the adoption of the income tax amendment it is no longer necessary to raise revenues by means of customs duties. With the immense revenue that we have to-day from other sources, if we repeal every sign of a tariff law the Government could run just as well as it is now run. Without increasing corporation income taxes or individual income taxes at all we would probably have ample revenue to meet all the needs of the Government, economically administered, with the tariff laws entirely repealed. My purpose in bringing this suggestion to the attention of the Senate at this time is to say to my protectionist friends that those who want to legislate money into pockets of the favored industries by reason of the tariff law had better go a little slow about it; they had better be reasonable about it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall yield in just one moment. They had better be reasonable about it; they had better be willing to take reasonable rates, to accept a tariff that is not so high as to crush the American consumer. They had better be willing to let the present law be modified and revised downward, because the time may arrive when the American people may come to the conclusion, which would seem to be a most natural conclusion, that such a tariff law as we now have is wholly at variance with common sense, wholly unscientific, and wholly at variance with what is right and what is just. It may not be done all at once, but the people may come to the conclusion that it is necessary to do away with these customs duties to the extent of so much a year for a period of years until they are all done away with, so that a fairer and juster method of taxation, such as the income tax law, may be resorted to instead of the antiquated, unfair, and burdensome system of customs duties for the purpose of raising revenue for the Government.

We raise nearly $900,000,000 from individual income taxes. In order to obtain that revenue we do not have to pay six or seven times that amount to favored interests. All we have to do is to impose income taxes; they are collected; nobody is injured, and no special interests are benefited. The income tax is a proper one; but when tariff duties are imposed to raise revenue for the Government it is necessary to go further and impose six or seven times the amount of the duty collected for the Government to be paid to favored interests. This subsidy has constantly grown and grown to such an extent that the time will come, in my judgment, unless the Republican majority are more reasonable than they seem to be now, when they will wish they had been reasonable in imposing customs duties. The people will not stand for such high taxes. We now impose taxes in the form of protective duties for the benefit of private interests in amount of about $4,000,000,000, an amount just about equal to the entire Federal revenues of the Nation.

I now yield to my friend from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator speaks of favorite or favored interests.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does he regard the agriculturists of this country—the farmers, the viticulturists, the horticulturists—as among the favorite or favored interests?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course not, Mr. President.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Everybody who is informed knows that a protective tariff does not materially help the farmer of this country. A tax of 42 cents a bushel has been imposed on wheat. Is it helping the wheat farmer? Substantially it is not helping him at all. One of the announced purposes of the farm bill, the McNary-Haugen bill, against which the Senator voted was to make the tariff law on wheat effective; but the Senator voted against that bill which was designed to apply to the farmers of the country.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, is the Senator addressing that remark to me, when he says I voted against some measure?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator voted against the McNary-Haugen bill, did he not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly; of course I did.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all I asserted.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And the President of the United States in his veto utterly annihilated it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be that he annihilated it for a time, but he may have to annihilate it again.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, he annihilated it for all time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Probably not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask to what portion of the President's veto does the Senator from California refer, because there were five different reasons given, if they may be called reasons?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. The Senator from California says the President annihilated it; and the President did annihilate it for a time, as he had a right to do. But it is still before the Congress and will most likely pass again.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He vetoed the measure on the ground that it was unconstitutional. That was one of the reasons, and that was a sufficient reason.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the next reason he said was because it did not include all the farmers. If it was unconstitutional, why did he want to have the remainder of the farmers brought under it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That was true of the bill. I think the viticulturist and the horticulturist are farmers.

Mr. CARAWAY. The President maintained that it was unconstitutional because it did not extend its provisions to all classes of farmers.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer, he wanted to give abundant reasons for vetoing the bill, and therefore, he gave more than one reason.

Mr. CARAWAY. There are enough of them, if that is what the Senator means by "abundant."

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment, and then I will yield further to the Senator from Arkansas. Referring to the Senator from California, I will say that I doubt if the farmers of his State or of the country at large will appreciate his attempted defense of them, for the reason that having voted against them every chance he got in connection with measures which they favored, I doubt very much whether they are going to pay a great deal of attention to "Greeks bearing gifts," and my handsome and distinguished friend is one of the Greeks bearing gifts in this connection.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to say—and the country, I trust, will excuse me for saying it——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure it will. I have already done it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That I was elected by the largest majority of any Senator of the United States who was a candidate at the last election.

Mr. McKELLAR. I congratulate the Senator upon his large majority.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And there was not one farmer or agricultural association in the State of California that protested against my vote against the bill to which reference has been made.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. In view of what the Senator from California has said, I think we ought to apologize and bring the marines from Nicaragua and invite Nicaragua to come to California to supervise the elections there. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will state why I received such a vote. It was because there were so many splendid men and women from West Virginia and from Tennessee who moved to California and became Republicans and voted for me.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is strange how some folk will go wrong.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not know that people of either State voted in California.

Mr. McKELLAR. If any Tennesseeans and West Virginians went out there and voted, they might have swelled the majority of the Senator, but perhaps they did not have the right to vote there.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There were some splendid citizens from Arkansas also, let me add, who approved of my record and voted for me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, why not settle this one question? I notice my friend from California seems to think that nobody ever was good until he turned Republican. Of course, that is a case of concealing one's virtue. However, I was not intending to speak of that. What I wanted to call attention to was the fact, if the Senator from Tennessee will pardon me further, that I have discovered upon the other side of the Chamber, led by the distinguished Senator from California, that they are in favor of the farmer having anything that he does not want and that will not help him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. But if he wants it, or if it will help him, they are opposed to him having it. That sums up rather accurately their position, does it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am going to see whether it does, because I am going to ask the Senator from California this question: Is he in favor of revising the farm schedules of the tariff in such a way as to benefit the farmer?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think there are quite a number of farm products now partly protected under the law as to which the rates should be increased.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator vote for the resolution now pending so as to help the farmers, who everybody, even the President of the United States, who vetoed the measure for their relief, agrees should be helped in some way? Is the Senator willing to vote for the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota, so that the schedules may be revised in the interest of the farmers of the United States?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a brief statement so as to make the situation plain?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well; make it plain to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMASTER. I will endeavor to make it plain to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Go ahead; I will be glad to have the interruption.

Mr. McMASTER. I wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee and to the Senator from California that under the revised language of the pending resolution, if it should be adopted and action should be taken in accordance with its expression, we can then raise the agricultural schedules; there can be no question about that; and if the Senator from California desires to raise those schedules to help the farmer he can vote for this resolution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from California excuse me, so that I may submit to him a revised question? Under the statement made by the Senator from South Dakota, the author of the resolution, that under his amended resolution the rates can be revised, and revised upward, so as to aid the farmer, in his opinion—and I imagine in the opinion of the Senator from California—will the Senator from California vote for the resolution now? If not, why not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer that question categorically "no"; and I can give, I think, many good reasons why this resolution should not pass, why it is unnecessarily taking up the time of the Senate; why, if passed, it would be unavailing; why it is not opportune.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that these rates could be revised so as to aid the farmer, and that he wanted that done.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then it is not unavailing. It would be availing. So I ask the Senator, now that he sees the opportunity under the wording of the resolution to have these rates raised so as to help the farmers whose friend he says he is, and all of whom voted for him in his State, is he not willing to do the right thing by the farmers and vote for this resolution, so that they can have some measure of relief?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My answer has already been given; but, since the question is again propounded, I further reply that I think this resolution is very inopportunely presented. I do not think it would be effective. It would not avail anything. Moreover, I think the Senator from Tennessee would do everything in his power to prevent the raising of any rate. If I understand correctly, he is opposed to the whole protective tariff system, and particularly would have all the rates on agricultural products removed; but I answer that I shall oppose this resolution in its present form or its modified form.

Let me ask a question, however.

Mr. McKELLAR. One moment. The Senator would oppose this resolution in any form, would he not?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. As of now; yes—as of now, and originating here in the Senate. This is no place for it. We could not even introduce a bill on the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. We could not originate it anywhere else.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It seems to me it is no great tribute to our intelligence, it is no great tribute to the Senate, to waste its time in this manner; and that I say prostrating myself in apology before the Senator from South Dakota. But let me ask the Senator, is he in favor now of repealing or lowering the duties on any one agricultural product?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, so far as the duties on agricultural products are concerned, I have very different notions from those of the Senator from California on that subject. I doubt very much whether any rates on farm products are effective. I doubt if they can be made effective. Apparently they are not effective now. If we are to have tariff duties, however, some scheme or method must be devised by which they can be made effective for the farmer just as they are now effective for industry. So, under those circumstances, I am very much in favor of our revising the schedules, taking them up and discussing them, and if they can be changed in some wise that will benefit the farmers of the country I shall be very happy to see them benefited, because I am one of those who believe that the farmers of the country are being discriminated against by Federal law. I believe that the farming industry should be equalized with the other industries of the country, and for that reason, among many others, I would welcome the opportunity to revise the tariff at this time.

Of course, I think the present tariff duties are entirely too high. They are the highest ever imposed. I think the schedule of rates now imposed under the Fordney-McCumber Act is entirely too high and should be revised, and revised downward, for the benefit of the farmers and for the benefit of the consumers and of all the people of the United States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But the Senator does not answer my question. To make it a little more specific, is the Senator in favor of reducing the rate, for example, on oranges, on lemons, on grapefruit, on rice, on walnuts, on almonds, on wheat? Is he in favor of reducing those or any of those rates?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know, and I shall not know until we have the matter considered. It ought to be considered in committee; it ought to be considered and debated here, and when so considered we should vote upon it; and when it is I expect to vote on it as my best judgment dictates. I know that the present rates now do not do the farmers any real good. I know that the rates we now impose generally are entirely too high. I am in favor of their revision downward at the earliest possible moment. I do not think we ought to wait until after an election, or wait until any other time. I think it ought to be done now. Therefore, I expect to vote for the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota; and I think he deserves the commendation of all right-thinking people in the country for introducing the measure at this time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator explain what he means by "right-thinking people"? Does he exclude the Senators on the other side?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not exclude anyone. I hope there are right-thinking people on both sides.

Mr. President, before the income tax amendment was passed customs duties, however unfair they were, could not be dispensed with because it was necessary by that means to raise money to carry on the Government. No such necessity arises now. The Government can be carried on by individual and corporation income taxes without much additional burden; so that I wish again to say to my high protectionist friends that in seeking to maintain the high rates of the Fordney-McCumber tariff law they may be playing with fire. Some day, no doubt, customs duties will be largely done away with. The commercial world is to-day too close together long to permit artificial barriers. If customs duties were a good thing, it would have been provided that they should be collected at every State line, but manifestly that would be a ruinous policy; and so the time is coming, I hope, when the entire high protective tariff policy of this country may be changed. It probably will be necessary that the change shall be brought about by successive steps. That would be the best way. That such an unfair and burdensome method of taxation should not exist for all time ought to be clear almost to any well-ordered mind. As long as it was necessary to obtain revenues for the Government in that way tariff duties were bound to be imposed; but, as I have stated before, there is no longer any absolute necessity for raising money by customs duties and our protectionist friends had better be very careful how they fight reasonable reductions of the present high tariff burdens.

Mr. President, this resolution ought to pass. I hope the House will soon pass and send over to us a tariff revision bill, and that we can speedily enact it into law.

FLOOD RELIEF

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, in view of the wide discussion of flood relief, the fact that bills on the subject have been introduced and are coming before the various committees of Congress, and in view especially of the feeling of those Members who have gone down into the Mississippi Valley and have seen the financial conditions of the counties there, I desire not to make a speech on the subject of flood relief but to read a communication which has been sent out to the Members of this body, in order that it may be made a part of the RECORD and be available to the committees as they are discussing this question of flood relief. It is addressed:

To all Members of Congress:

I have the honor to place before you the tabulated vote on a referendum on Mississippi flood control conducted by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, which closed on December 15, 1927. Through this vote of the membership the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is committed in favor of the following proposals:

First. That the Federal Government should hereafter pay the entire cost of constructing and maintaining works necessary to control floods of the lower Mississippi River (2,131 votes in favor and 512 votes opposed).

Second. That the Federal Government should assume the sole responsibility for locating, constructing, and maintaining such works (2,581 votes in favor and 240 votes opposed).

Third. That there should be an adequate appropriation to insure efficient, continuous, and economic work, the funds to be available as needed (2,657½ votes in favor and 156½ votes opposed).

Fourth. That flood control of the Mississippi River should be dealt with in legislation and administration upon its own merits, separate and distinct from any other undertaking (2,629½ votes in favor and 231½ votes opposed).

These conclusions are based upon votes cast by 1,053 chambers of commerce and trade associations in every State in America. We hope that this expression of the sentiment of American business organizations will be helpful to you in reaching conclusions as to legislation dealing with this urgent national problem.

Yours sincerely,

LEWIS E. PIERSON, President.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR THE DAY

The CLERK. The Clerk will read a letter from the Speaker.

THE SPEAKER'S ROOMS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1928.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON to act as Speaker pro tempore to-day.

NICHOLAS LONGWORTH.

Mr. TILSON assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who has taught us to say, "Our Father," teach us to say, "Thy will be done." It is the foundation of our usefulness, hope, and redemption. Inspire us with the knowledge that the issues of life are not from without but from within. Do Thou lift up the standard of truth and wisdom before us, and may it gleam on our way. Give us the blessedness of the man whose delight is in the law of the Lord and who can tell of Thy statutes rejoicing the heart. May failure never set its cloud upon our labors. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of the pending appropriation bill has taken longer than was expected and, therefore, we have not had an opportunity to consider bills on the Private Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with to-day and that after the completion of the pending appropriation bill it may be in order to take up bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to for the balance of the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that upon the disposition of the appropriation bill now pending Calendar Wednesday business be dispensed with, and that the House proceed to consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what effect will that have in postponing indefinitely the consideration of the Norris amendment to abolish lame-duck sessions?

Mr. SNELL. I do not think it will have a particle of effect one way or the other.

Mr. KVALE. To dispense with Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. SNELL. It will dispense with Calendar Wednesday to-day, but the matter to which the gentleman refers is not ready to be considered to-day, so that this action will not affect the consideration of it in any way whatever.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, are there no committees having bills to present for the consideration of the House?

Mr. SNELL. I understand there is only one bill on the calendar at the present time, and that is on the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, submitted a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 9136) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

SENATE BILL REFERRED

A bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 1968. An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to pay for the use and occupancy by the Department of Agriculture of the Bieber Building, 1358 B Street SW., Washington, D. C., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

On motion of Mr. SNELL, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

WILL ROGERS

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. For the purpose of stating a question of the highest personal privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. The personal privilege is in behalf of a brother Member of this House who happens to bear my own name.

It seems that a few days ago my colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma of my name delivered a talk here on the floor to the ear of the House and the country proposing for President of the United States a man who during the past year has preached more honest-to-goodness, progressive Democratic gospel than any other man whose name has been mentioned for the Presidency on either side, with the possible exception of Al Smith. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman seconding now the motion nominating this man?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Pretty soon—not yet. [Laughter.]

It so happens that the greatest cartoonist in the world, Mr. Berryman [applause], got his lines mixed just a little bit and last evening he drew and presented in the Evening Star what has been said by my prejudiced friends to be a very beautiful picture of me [laughter], putting me in the attitude of presenting the name of Will Rogers for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency.

The personal privilege I state is this: A Member of this House, by a cartoonist, here within the shadow of the Capitol, has been deprived of the honor which belongs to him; and it was a great honor, Mr. Speaker, for my colleague [Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma] to be privileged to first present the name of Will Rogers for the Democratic presidential nomination. Why? Because Will Rogers is the only man of any party in the United States who has had the stomachical courage to ask a great question—"Why are we in Nicaragua, and what the hell are we doing there?" [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a right to plead for fairness in the name and in the behalf of a Howard. It is a wonderful name. Perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, and others might be interested in the origin of that name. [Laughter.] It seems that long ago, under one of the Irish kings, when my own forefathers and the forebears of the Oklahoma Howards and of Sir Esme Howard, the most erudite and humane ambassador ever sent from St. James to Washington, were mostly hiding in the brush, for reasons not here to be stated, it was the custom of the monarchs to appoint wardens of the king's hounds, wardens of the horse, and wardens of the hogs. Well, my people were of the hog wardens [laughter], but finally, as has happened in our own language here in this country, the people began to corrupt it, and instead of calling us hog wardens they called us hogwards, and one day there was a harelipped young man who could not pronounce things very well and he just dropped the "g." So we have been Howards ever since. [Laughter and applause.] That is all. [Applause.]

UNVEILING OF A MONUMENT AT BLACK WOLF, VA.

Mr. PEERY. Mr. Speaker, on June 14, 1927, Hon. Wells Goodykoontz, a former Member of this House, delivered a notable address of historic interest at the unveiling of a monument erected by the Col. Andrew Donally Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, at Black Wolf, McDowell County, W. Va., and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing the same in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

THE OBJECT OF THE MEETING

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Under the providence of God and in this free country of ordered government we are assembled on this beautiful summer afternoon at an historic place to establish a monument whereon is a record to perpetuate the memory of three brave men who here fought with the Indians on what was then the frontier of the settlement.

THE DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

The erection of this monument, with its tablet, is to be credited to the tireless and unselfish labors of the officers and members of the Col. Andrew Donally Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of the county of McDowell.

The primary purpose of this society is the preservation of historic places, objects, and records pertaining to the American Revolution, and the erection of monuments on historic sites.

The founding of this actively patriotic organization marked a new era in American history and has caused an increased, fervent glow of patriotism.

In proving eligibility to membership ancient court records are searched, old Bibles with their priceless family records recovered, histories examined, traditions run down, and lineage to a worthy ancestor connected with the struggle for independence thereby established.

This work of investigation, and the production of proof sufficient to authenticate lineal descent from an American ancestor who rendered a military or other public service to the Colonies in their successful effort to throw off the yoke of tyranny imposed by the British monarch, has served to increase and widely diffuse a greater knowledge of history, an appreciation and pride of ancestry, a love for the beautiful in art, a veneration for things made sacred by reason of antiquity, a continuing regard for the memory of the noble pioneers—men and women—who endured hardship amid peril to the end that others might dwell in contentment, peace, and happiness, and, above all else, a profound reverence for the things that are sacred to every lover of liberty—the Declaration, the Constitution, the flag, and Lincoln's Gettysburg Address—these accomplishments, among others, have come as the ennobling result of the work of the Daughters of the Revolution.

In erecting memorials to others they are, in reality—although oblivious of the fact—rearing a lofty and enduring monument to themselves.

ONE OR TWO BLACK SHEEP IN THE FAMILY

We are met to do honor to three members of the Harman family, but, before proceeding to the main subject, there is a matter that I wish first to dispose of.

Although somewhat reluctant, publicly, to make the statement, yet, conformable to a strict regard for truth and candor, and agreeable to the principle of law that an exception proves the rule, I am forced to admit that there is one black sheep in the Harman family. It were not necessary to mention the name of this unruly member, for his identity and reputation are well known throughout this entire region—in fact, his reputation is known to the people of two States, Virginia and West Virginia. I would not thus dare to speak so plainly of Mr. J. N. Harman, jr., of the Welch bar, did I not know whereof I speak. The fact is, I, myself, have run around quite a bit with "Newt."

Doctor Iaager once said of himself that he was an illustrious son of a degenerate sire. Our friend "Newt" may labor under the same delusion, but if so, and for a satisfactory reason, he keeps his thought unto himself.

Perhaps I should have said, there were two "black sheep" in the Harman family, for am I not related, if not by affinity, then by consanguinity, unto that family? The Harmans may, or may not recognize the relationship. A bright friend of mine once said to me, his experience had taught him, that kinfolk were of little advantage. He said, that if they were poor and of no account, he would have nothing to do with them; and if, to the contrary, they were rich and influential, they would have nothing to do with him.

ANCESTRY AND BIRTH OF HENRY HARMAN

A Teutonic family name signifies something more than a mere name.

In German the letter "e" is generally pronounced the same as "a" in our own language.

The transition of the Germanic name, Hermann, to the Americanized Harman was, therefore, an easy and quite natural evolution.

While our spelling of the name differs from the original, the sound remains the same.

Hermann, we are told, implies honor. Definitively, it means—according to Rupp—one who subdues; a master man; a warrior.

Henry Harman, therefore, was not improperly named. Senator John Newton Harman, sr., has written not only a history of Tazewell County, Va., in two volumes, but also a genealogy of the Harman family. Only one who has carried the burden of such a task can appreciate the cost to body and mind involved. Every member of that numerous and widely scattered family should rise up and call him blessed.

We are indebted to this painstaking investigator and historian for a record of the life and career of Heinrich Adam Hermann, the father of Henry, and it was the exploit of the latter, acting in conjunction with his two sons, George and Mathias, that has moved the daughters to perpetuate their heroic action.

Henry was the second son of Heinrich Adam Hermann, who was born in southern Germany, near the common source of the Danube and the Rhine.

The author aforementioned, in one of his volumes, has transcribed and translated from the priceless old German Lutheran Bible of Heinrich Adam Hermann the following:

"I, Heinrich Adam Hermann, married Louisa Katrina October 8, 1723, and have together begotten 11 children, and have lived in matrimony as true married folks should up to the year 1749, when my dear wife died March 18, and was buried the 21st, which fell on a Monday.

"The blood of Jesus Christ cleanses us of all our sins. Amen.

"Lord Jesus, for you I lived. Yours I am in death."

"And," he continues, "my wife, Louisa Katrina" (he does not specify her family name), "her last meditation was this: 'I know that my Savior lives and will support me when leaving the earth * * * and in my flesh will see God the same evening, and my eyes will perceive him.'"

Realizing that she must soon quit the scenes of this life, that grand old mother in Zion—as divined and set down by her husband—further said:

"All men must die, and I must leave."

And then the record tells us—

* * * "They sang for her the last song, 'My Earthly Travels are O'er.'"

The hymn having been concluded, with the old man and the children standing around the death bed, she said: "Goodnight, all my loved ones," and died 9 o'clock, 25 minutes.

GERMAN MIGRATION TO AMERICA

The Germans in migrating to America usually began their long journey by traveling in river boats to the mouth of the Rhine. The trip down usually required from four to six weeks, the travelers being held up by the petty officials of every little principality demanding customs duty, and purposely delayed in order that shop and innkeepers might profit from their scanty means.

The emigrant ships, commanded by English masters, sailed from Goeree, a port on the North Sea near Rotterdam. These were sailing boats that crossed the ocean. The vessels of the larger size were 99 feet in length, 26 feet in breadth, and of 311 tons capacity.

Some of the ships' lists as of that day show as many as 480 passengers. How a ship so small could accommodate so many passengers we can not very well understand.

Ships sailing from Rotterdam for America usually touched at Cowes or the Isle of Man, where they took on supplies and went through certain formalities required by the maritime and immigration laws of England. The time required for the voyage across the ocean varied from two to six months, depending on wind and weather. The boats that successfully weathered the storms landed at the port of Philadelphia. Some that sailed went down at sea.

The reason for leaving the Palatinate—southern Germany—was due, in large measure, to the "thirty years' war." The effect of this war upon Germany was vastly destructive of her population as well as her property. According to Myers (General History, sec. 791), "the Duchy of Wurtemberg had one-half million of inhabitants at the commencement of the war; at its close had barely 50,000," or only one out of ten. This authority further says that on every hand were the charred remains of the hovels of the peasants and the palaces of the nobility. Vast districts lay waste without an inhabitant. The very soil in many regions had reverted to its primitive wildness.

Later, France conducted another war in southern Germany, known as the "war of the Palatinate." Louis, the French monarch, ordered that the country should again be laid waste. According to Myers, all tangible improvements, even the fruit trees, vines, and crops, were destroyed. It is, therefore, not surprising that Adam Harman, together with many thousands of his fellow countrymen, should have bid farewell to that troubled land and sailed for the New World, in the Western Hemisphere.

PENNSYLVANIA

Emigrants to Pennsylvania, the forests of William Penn, were attracted there by Penn, who prepared and circulated a prospectus stating his plan of government, the price he would charge for the land, and the wonderful advantages and opportunities afforded the settler. The price he asked for the land was less than 10 cents per acre, and the purchaser was to have a voice in the making of the laws that would govern the Province.

Penn made a favorable treaty with the Indians under the famous elm tree at Shack-a-Maxon, whereby the Indians promised to "live in love with William Penn and his children as long as the sun and moon give light." It is said that this was the only Indian treaty ever made and never broken.

Many of the emigrants who purchased land from Penn were able to dispose of the same at a nice profit, and some having done this moved down into the Shenandoah Valley or elsewhere in Virginia and into North Carolina, where they were able to buy good land at a very low price and thus increase the area of their holdings.

GOOD FAMILY STOCK

In recent years I have observed upon the part of some in whose veins flow blood of German extraction a disposition to deny their racial origin, and to claim that they are descended from Dutch or Huguenot ancestry.

As for myself I would not alter the fact, if I could, that the birth of three of my grandparents was recorded in German Bibles, no less than I would deny the further fact that my forbears, in company with the Harmans, helped to fight the battles of the Revolution.

The German regiments of Pennsylvania, the one organized in the Shenandoah Valley, and the soldiers of German origin under other commands did their work well and faithfully. They made their own guns and manufactured their own powder. Moreover, they were good marksmen, for history records that they could place an ounce ball within a 4-inch circle at a distance of 300 yards.

This contingent of Colonial citizenship, being free of the Tory element, put their whole heart and soul in the fight for freedom, and when liberty had been won, with characteristic industry and economy assiduously went forward with their fellow citizens in the work of building the Nation.

When danger approached or there was a difficult task to be performed, the Harmans led the way. They were natural fighters and took the lead in all the combats with the Indians, as witness the battles of Tug River, Little River, and Warfield; and in the rescue of Mary Ingles, and, on another occasion, Jennie Wiley, each of whom had been captured by the Indians.

These forbears were characterized not only by fortitude and a supreme courage, but by a Christian faith and an upright walk in life that was truly commendable.

Should there be grounds for wonder that later generations of that truly remarkable family should have attained undue success and distinction?

The men and women bearing the honored name of Harman may well "point with pride" to their noble ancestry. These come from good stock, and blood counts in men and women no less than in other animals.

Henry Harman, according to tradition, was born on the Isle of Man about 1726, at which the vessel touched on its way from Rotterdam to the port of Philadelphia.

According to the Harman Genealogy (p. 71), Henry, when 10 years of age, moved with his parents from Pennsylvania to Strasburg, in the Shenandoah Valley. Nine years later—in 1745—the family moved and settled at Eggleston Springs, on Woods, now known as New River.

Senator Harman, in his Genealogy, shows that by a report of the survey of a road filed in Orange County court in 1745 the road is described as ending" at the house of Adam Harman, on New or Woods River." Mr. William E. Connelly, secretary of the Kansas State Historical Society, who has given special attention to the history of the Mississippi Valley, and is the author of valuable histories, commenting on the discovery of Mr. Harman, has written: "So the honor and distinction of having erected the first dwelling and making the first permanent settlement of English-speaking people in the Mississippi Valley goes to that sturdy pioneer, Adam Harman. For though he was German in blood and spoke the German tongue, he also spoke English and was fully identified with the English westward movement in Virginia * * * and was a citizen of Virginia."

It is presumed that Henry Harman and his oldest brother, Adam, were the sons who, with their father, the elder Adam Harman, rescued Mrs. Ingles on her return to New River after her four months' captivity by the Indians.

Henry Harman was made a captain of the militia to defend "His Majesty's Colonies." In 1759 he commanded the militia in fights with the Indians on New River.

In 1787 he planned and led the pursuit of the Shawnee Indians after their capture of the English (Ingles) family in Burks Garden.

One year later he and his two sons, George and Mathias, fought here on Tug River the battle with the seven Indians.

There are many other important incidents in the life of Henry Harman worthy to be mentioned, a record of which is to be found in various histories, which I shall not have the time to speak of on this occasion.

We are told that after an eventful life he died in 1822 at Hollybrook, in what is now Bland County, Va., at the age of 95 years. Thus ended the career of the great Indian fighter, forbear, and citizen, Capt. Henry Harman.

THE BATTLE

The monumenting stone with tablet before you marks the spot, well authenticated, where Henry Harman and two of his sons, George and Mathias, engaged in battle with seven Shawnee Indians, the leader of whom was Chief Black Wolf, alleged to have been the son of the noted Indian warrior, Chief Cornstalk, slain at Point Pleasant, W. Va., and at whose grave, in the courthouse yard, a monument has been erected.

In that unequal battle the three Harmans were surrounded by the Indians, seven in number; only four of the latter had guns, the others being armed with bows and arrows, tomahawks, and scalping knives.

Two of the Indians having been wounded by the fire of George and his father, one of the Indians rushed at George with tomahawk raised for a blow, but when within striking distance George let down upon his head with the gun, which brought the Indian to the ground; recovering, the Indian made at him again, but George seized the Indian's knife and plunged it deep into his side, and Mathias with a tomahawk struck him on the head and finished the work with him.

Two Indians had attacked the old man and were maneuvering around him to get a clear fire at his left breast. The Harmans to a man wore their bullet pouch on their left side. When the old man had nearly completed the loading of his gun an Indian fired at him, striking his arm and cutting an artery. A moment later "the fearful string was heard to vibrate and an arrow entered Mr. Harman's breast and lodged against a rib." Mathias, who had been directed by his father to reserve his fire, was then granted permission to shoot. An Indian, the chief, was standing under a large beech tree. At the report of the rifle the Indian fell, throwing his tomahawk high among the branches of the tree under which he stood. Seeing that two of them were dead and two others of their number badly wounded, the surviving Indians made off.

The arm of Mr. Harman was tied up, his pipe lit, his face washed; the Indians were scalped, the tomahawks gathered up with the arrows, including those which had punctured Mr. Harman's body, and the Harmans then began their march back to the settlement.

Upon the beech tree, under which the chief was killed, was roughly carved an Indian, a bow, and a gun, commemorative of the fight. The monument stands near where the beech tree stood.

In narrating the facts relating to the battle I have freely used, without quotations, the text of Doctor Bickley's History of Tazewell County, as corrected and supplemented by Senator Harman in his genealogy of the family and in his two volumes entitled "Annals of Tazewell County."

THE BATTLE GROUND

Turning our eyes toward the distant past let us, in imagination, undertake to visualize conditions existing here on November 12, 1788.

On that gray November evening of nearly a century and a half ago there stood on this ground a primeval forest of spreading beech, giant oak and lofty poplar, unscarred by the hand of man.

The solitude of that Cathedral of God had continued unbroken except for the voices of nature.

The denizens of the forest were there. The black bear, the fleet-footed deer, and the wild turkey made it their home, and the stillness of the night was broken by the lonesome hoot of an owl or the scream of the panther.

Once in a while bands of hostile Indians, their feet incased in moccasins, took the war path leading from the Ohio up the Guyandotte, or the Big Sandy, and silently passed this way in order to reach the Virginia settlements, there to commit their depredations.

But America was no longer an unknown continent, a lonely land. Civilization having come and occupied a wide area along the Atlantic—and settlers being scattered over the entire eastern escarpment of the Appalachians—was now advancing.

Brave and adventurous souls occupied the outposts of the settlements, and these, intermittently but gradually, were breaking through the mountains and pushing westwardly into the wilderness.

The march of the pioneer, constituting an epic in American history, never faltered and never rested until halted on the shores of the Pacific Ocean.

THE MOTHERS OF THE FRONTIER

The hardships and perils of life on the frontier were far greater for the women than for the men.

Living in lonely cabins at great distances apart, with the men away from home, in the field at work, or out hunting for game—that being a matter of necessity in order to procure bread and meat for the table—or with the militia on some military expedition, either punitive or defending the settlement, the women remained at home, in charge of the children, and suffering from an indescribable dread, being constantly exposed to danger, fraught with the most terrible consequences.

What must have been the state of her mind to realize that at any moment—night or day—powerful, cruel, copper-skinned savages of a strange tongue with a gutteral sound were likely to emerge from the dark woods and enter her cabin home.

The horror of her fear was that of seeing the brains of the baby at her breast dashed out against the trunk of a tree, as was the experience of Mrs. Moore at Abbs Valley, the home set on fire, and she herself led into the forest by a lecherous animal in the form of a man, finally to be marched as a captive hundreds of miles from home and, it might be, burned at the stake.

Whether the pioneer mothers' distress of mind went no further than dread, or whether her fears were fulfilled in actuality, she rendered unto posterity and civilization a service a thousand times greater than was ever rendered by any man upon the battle field.

The place you have monumented is sacred ground. May the memorial you have erected stand always as an evidence and a testimony of your appreciation of those who fought here that others might live in peace and happiness.

ARTICLE BY HON. JOHN Q. TILSON

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article appearing in the American Forests Magazine, written by the Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON, of Connecticut. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under consent granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following:

(Mr. TILSON, in "A Plea for the Forests," has given expression to observations of forest conditions made by him during the past summer in the course of an extended trip through China, Japan, Korea, and a large portion of the western United States. From the majority leader of the House these views and conclusions will, very naturally, command wide interest.—Editor American Forests Magazine.)

A PLEA FOR THE FORESTS

It is often said that a statesman is a dead politician, which usually means that the statesman is not always recognized or fully appreciated during his lifetime. If we must insist upon some sort of sinister meaning for the much-abused word "politician," a much better characterization would be that the politician looks only to the present, or at least to the next election, while the statesman looks to the future welfare of the country, even at the expense of present prestige. Perhaps in no other one thing pertaining to the public welfare are these two viewpoints so well illustrated as in connection with the preservation and reproduction of forests. The long period of time required to grow a forest often brings present interest into conflict with the future.

It is stated in the New Testament that the leaves of the trees were for the healing of the nations and many diverse interpretations have been made of this poetic text. The leaves of the trees spread welcome shade where the sun is hot for rest and refreshment; they have become dust out of which plants are grown for both food and raiment. Many other direct and obvious uses of the leaves of the trees will occur to anyone. The trunks and branches which bear the leaves have even more varied and obvious uses. They produce shelter from the inclement weather, clothing, fuel, weapons, means of transportation, and material for a thousand different useful purposes.

All the uses to which reference has been made are apparent and manifest. There are others not so well understood or so generally accepted, but which are of very great importance. For instance, the effect of forest growth upon the climate, the amount and distribution of rainfall and the regularity in the flow of streams are all matters affecting very vitally life on the earth's surface and all are in turn affected by the existence or nonexistence of forests.

Thus far reference has been made only to some of the useful purposes directly served by forests. The case in favor of the forests can not be adequately made up, however, without at the same time taking into the account some of the injury that flows from the wasteful destruction of the forests and their removal from uplands and mountains. When well-forested areas are entered upon by would-be settlers for the purpose of establishing homes and gaining a livelihood by tilling the soil, the forest is encountered as something that must be met and overcome by irksome labor, so that it is not to be wondered at that the pioneer regarded the forest more in the light of an enemy than as a friend.

I recall quite vividly my own life as a youngster in the fine forests of hardwoods and pine on the slopes of the southern Appalachian Mountains, where each year new land was cleared for cultivation and in doing so the finest trees were felled indiscriminately, cut into manageable lengths, rolled into immense heaps, and burned. As I look back upon those scenes from the viewpoint of the present they seem almost criminal in their wastefulness, and yet it was only a case of apparent present necessity being met at the expense of the indistinctly foreseen future. The lands that were stripped of forests supported life and, therefore, to the extent necessary for that purpose, their denudation was justified, but probably by careful tillage half the land would have served the purpose, while half the acreage of my father's farm covered with the primeval forests would now be a small fortune.

It is only when the forests are gone and the many ill effects from it begin to develop that one can see clearly the mistake. When the pinch of high-priced lumber brought from a distance begins to be felt, those who may have thought little about it begin to take notice. Then firewood begins to grow scarce and good wood difficult to procure at any price. These things again are directly felt. It is the indirect effects that are the most hurtful and far-reaching. When the forests on the hillsides are felled and the humus formed from decomposing leaves is removed erosion soon begins and the land itself rapidly loses its productiveness. When the rain falls in the forests the force of the fall is broken by the leaves and branches, so that it drops gently to earth to be sucked into the ground by the leaves and the spongy humus, while the standing trees protect from the sun's rays, thus lessening the immediate evaporation. The water thus taken into the ground finds its way into underground waters and comes out in perpetual springs. Of all the blessings vouchsafed by the Creator to His creatures none is greater and none is so essential to life itself as living water. It is at its best when it gushes from the earth at the foot of a wooded hill. Follow it in its journey to the sea. Along its course it serves to slake the thirst of man and beast and all vegetation; it turns wheels to furnish power for a thousand human wants; it carries man and his commerce wheresoever he will, and finally adds its flood to replenish the great reservoir of the sea. It blesses man at every stage of its journey and this is as it was intended to be by the beneficent Creator.

On the other hand, let us see what happens when man has done his handiwork badly. When the rain falls upon the denuded hillside there are no trees to break the fall or prevent rapid evaporation, or leaves or spongy humus to drink it up. Instead of being taken into the earth it runs off rapidly, carrying with it the loose soil and small gravel, thus leaving the land unproductive. It rushes on increasing in volume until it becomes a destructive flood. The process just described, multiplied many thousand times, with a most unfortunate coincidence in their coming together, has just produced the most destructive catastrophe that has ever visited this country, destroying precious lives and untold millions of property in the great Delta region of the Mississippi River.

We have followed only the water itself in its destructive course. What of the soil and silt carried from the uplands? First, it makes the water less fit for human use. Next, the sand, being heavier than the soil, is first dropped out, covering up fertile lands so as to make them unproductive. Reaching the more quiet waters, other sediment drops, filling up useful ditches and stream beds, and finally, as the streams enter the sea, forming bars across their mouths, thus obstructing navigation.

No one can visit China without having the tragic lesson of forest destruction borne in upon him in a most forceful manner. China has 400,000,000 population. In area it is one of the largest countries in all the world. It contains some of the very large rivers of the world. China has comparatively an extremely small mileage of railroads, so that its rivers should be relatively more important than those of any other country. And yet what do we find? The mouths of all its rivers choked with sand bars. Up to about 10 years ago large ships could not discharge at the docks of Shanghai. At last the enormous commerce of this great port forced its improvement, but it was a huge and expensive undertaking. Vessels of any considerable draft can not now reach Tientsin at all, but must stop outside of Taku Bar. Tientsin is situated in a great alluvial plain which has been brought down from the region of Peking and above by the Hai Ho River. All the hills and mountains in all this region were denuded of their forests evidently many centuries ago. No forests remain, but that they were once forest covered or at least are capable of producing trees is shown by the many sacred trees about their temples and the tombs of their ancestors. The rain now falls upon the barren slopes and rapidly rushes to the sea, carrying with it every particle of detached earth that it can carry. The sediment containing sand and gravel is deposited upon the fertile fields, while the finer sediment is carried into irrigation ditches, the beds of streams, and canals.

In Korea the same mistake of denuding the hillsides has been made as in China, with identical results so far as time has permitted. Doubtless China had been stripped of its forests for centuries while Korea was still a well-wooded country, but Korea is no longer well wooded, having been denuded to its very mountain peaks, while the same sad story is being written of the barren mountains being washed down to fill up the precious irrigation ditches and to cover with worthless sand and silt the precious rice paddies and fertile wheat fields.

It is worthy of note that since Japan took over Korea a very ambitious and expensive program of reforestation has been entered upon and is now being carried on there with every indication of a finally successful outcome, but it will require many decades of time and an unlimited amount of money to undo, even in small part, the great injury done to this unfortunate country by the reckless expenditure of its great forest wealth.

Japan herself has done much better in this regard in her own little island empire. The islands are evidently of comparatively recent geological formation, so that there are many high mountains with precipitous slopes and much of the land is steeply sloping hillsides. From some of these the forests were stripped carelessly and erosion had begun its deadly work, but has not been permitted to run its destructive course as in China and to a lesser degree in Korea. In fact, in no other one thing are those who have directed the internal affairs of Japan to be so much commended as for the masterly, statesman-like forestry policy that has been inaugurated and is now being carried out in that country.

Our own country is old, geologically speaking, but quite youthful in point of utilization of the land either for the timber originally standing on it or for agricultural purposes. The time has not been sufficient in which to make all the mistakes of older countries, but, considering the brief period of our history, we have surely made our share and the end is not yet. It is already apparent what the end will be. We must not stumble blindly on into the condition of China and other portions of the Orient or even to the state already reached by some parts of Europe.

The problem of saving and replacing our forests is a difficult one—in fact, one of the most difficult with which the statesmen and business men of our day have to deal. The problem is greatly complicated for us by our dual form of State and Federal Government, which has worked so well in separating local from really national affairs, and which should be preserved as one of our most beneficent institutions. The forests, of necessity, are local and must be dealt with primarily as matters of State concern. But the direct influence of forests or lack of forests is felt beyond the confines of a single State and so becomes national in effect.

The taxing of forest lands presents another difficulty. Few are willing to pay heavy yearly taxes on lands which have no annual yield and which in the very nature of things can not yield an income during the life of the taxpayer. Lands in the States of Washington and Oregon, for instance, which have yielded up their original stand of fir and cedar will under proper conditions reforest themselves, but the cost of proper fire protection added to the taxes makes it a doubtful financial venture to undertake to hold it until the new forest can produce an income. The result is that destructive fires devastate most of the cut-over lands and much of it is permitted to be sold for taxes.

The sale of cut-over lands for taxes of itself offers a hopeful suggestion that may possibly help bring the solution of this one phase of the forestry problem. The State itself pays no taxes. It does not die as individual personal taxpayers do and can afford to wait until the next generation or even until the next century for its profit provided the investment is sound and the resulting effect of holding the land is meanwhile beneficent. The idea of State socialism is repugnant to me, but I see no insuperable difficulty in the State resuming the title to the land during the period of reforestation and then under conditions fair to the public, returning it to private ownership at the proper time.

APPROPRIATION BILL FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the House adjourned yesterday the engrossment of the appropriation bill had just been ordered when the demand was made for reading of the engrossed copy. So the first business in order is the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill (H. R. 8269).

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not insist on the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The demand for the reading is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read the bill by title.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. CELLER and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will read. I have handed the motion to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is opposed to the bill and for that reason I offer the motion to recommit, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet demanding recognition, and as the Members will remember, I gave notice of my motion to recommit yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York was also on his feet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But, I think, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will bear with me, I was seeking recognition for this purpose during the consideration of the bill and a demand was made in order to hold the motion until this morning with the understanding I would be recognized at this time to submit a motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any arrangement of that kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House will bear with the Chair for a moment, the Chair will state, in the first place, that recognition is within the discretion of the Chair, except as to the fact of opposition to the bill. In the next place, the Chair will attempt to give recognition in accordance with the practice of the House. Knowing that there would be demands made from both sides of the House for recognition, the Speaker before designating the present occupant of the chair to preside to-day, talked with me about it and said that as between two Members, neither of them being a member of the committee in charge of the bill under consideration, with equal rights in all other respects, except that one of them is on the majority side and the other on the minority side, he would recognize the gentleman on the minority side; which in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair is the sound practice of this House. In accordance with that practice and the express approval of the Speaker himself, I have recognized the gentleman from New York, who submits a motion to recommit and on that motion demands the previous question. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CELLER moves to recommit the bill (H. R. 8269) to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report forthwith the following amendment: On page 111, line 8, strike out "$7,110,000" and insert "$7,210,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And on that the gentleman from New York moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SHREVE, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LUCIUS BELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2284) for the relief of Lucius Bell.
The Clerk read the title of the bill.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask a question. On the claim of the soldier that after enlisting in 1861 he had consumption and went home, the War Department made the following report:

The records show that Lucius Bell was enrolled April 30, 1861, and was mustered into service May 13, 1861, as a private of Company B, Twelfth New York Volunteer Infantry, to serve three months. On the roll of his company, dated August 13, 1861, he was reported as "deserted from the company on the 21st day of July, 1861."

He was mustered into the service on May 13 and on the 21st day of July the same year he is reported as deserting. That is all the record we have.
Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we are not proposing to correct this man's record in such a way that he can have a pension from it.
Mr. BLANTON. But he will draw one from the date of the passage of this act, will he not?
Mr. WOODRUFF. No, indeed. He can not, because we merely correct the record as of July 31, 1861, and he will then not have served the 90 days necessary under the law to give him a pension. All this old man wants is to have his military record corrected. He does not care for the pension.
Mr. BLANTON. If he enlisted and was mustered into the service in May and deserted before August in 1861, and did not perform the services he was expected to perform, ought his record to be corrected?
Mr. WOODRUFF. I think it should; otherwise I would not have introduced the bill. I know this old man personally, very well. I know his high character, and I for one want to see that the charge of desertion is removed from his record.
Mr. BLANTON. It is very unfortunate that the disease which he offered as his excuse for the charge of desertion was consumption, commonly known as tuberculosis, because ordinarily when a man has tuberculosis he does not live from 1861 to 1928.
Mr. WOODRUFF. I think that is true.
Mr. BLANTON. But I shall not stand in the way of our friend from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], who does valuable service here for the country. It will not cost the United States a cent.
Mr. WOODRUFF. It will not cost the United States one penny.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.
The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws, Lucius Bell, late of Company B, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged July 21, 1861: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, merely to ask the question.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I hope my friend will not object to this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I wanted to find out from our friend why the report of the War Department was not attached to this committee report?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am not a member of the committee, and can not say.

Mr. BLANTON. A report has come from the committee which does not bring with it the report of the War Department. Therefore the committee report comes with some suspicion.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The bill has already passed the House twice.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the War Department report unfavorably upon this bill?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It does; but an affidavit shows another situation, different from that set forth in the department's report.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object, but I think the committee ought to be fair enough to the House, when it reports a bill and has submitted it to the War Department for its report, to attach that department's report.

Mr. HUDSPETH. We repeatedly pass such bills when the War Department has turned them down.

Mr. BLANTON. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, John Costigan shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as a private in Company D, Fifth United States Cavalry, from March 27, 1878, and to have been honorably discharged May 31, 1881: Provided, That no back pay, back pension, or other back allowance shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

MICHAEL PATRICK SULLIVAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 929) for the relief of Michael Patrick Sullivan.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to read what the War Department says. This report is signed by Robert C. Davis, The Adjutant General of the United States Army:

The official records show that Michael P. Sullivan enlisted April 14, 1899, at Dayton, Ohio, for three years, and was assigned to Battery N, Fourth United States Artillery.

He was tried by a general court-martial convened at Fort Monroe, Va., and found guilty of absence without leave, in violation of the thirty-second article of war, evidence of five previous convictions having been considered—

I want you to get that—evidence of five previous convictions having been considered, and was sentenced "to be dishonorably discharged the service of the United States, forfeiting all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for three months."

The sentence was duly approved by competent authority and was published in Special Orders, No. 250, paragraph 8, Headquarters Department of the East, dated October 30, 1899, which designated Fort Monroe, Va., as the place of confinement. Pursuant to the sentence, he was dishonorably discharged at Fort Monroe, Va., November 2, 1899, and was released from confinement at that place January 14, 1900.

I have not objected to correcting the military records of these old soldiers who have survived the Civil War, but this is not such a case as should be approved. This is a case where the man was convicted six different times. This did not happen long ago, but within comparatively recent years. I do not think we ought to consider this precedent, because it will become a precedent.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman know what he was convicted of?

Mr. BLANTON. Here is what the report states:

He was tried by a general court-martial convened at Fort Monroe, Va., and found guilty of absence without leave, in violation of the thirty-second article of war, evidence of five previous convictions having been considered.

Mr. KING. What for?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, for something for which an expensive court-martial was invoked. He was given a fair trial, we presume, and had counsel to represent him, because in all court-martial cases the accused has counsel furnished to him free by the Government. He was convicted six times, and I do not think we should put this man back on the honorable roll and give him a pension for the rest of his life.

Mr. KING. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Will it have any weight with the gentleman to tell him that this House has passed this bill once before?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because we pass them here just like we are passing them to-day. The Clerk reads the title of the bill and the Chair says, "Without objection, the bill will be engrossed, read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider is laid on the table," all in one breath. That is the way they are passed.

Mr. KING. It is our negligence.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish I did not feel I have to object because of my friendship for the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. Oh, I have nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object to the old Civil War veterans having their military records corrected, but I do object to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to reappoint John P. Pence, formerly an officer in the Signal Corps, United States Army, an officer in the Signal Corps, United States Army, in the grade and in the position on the promotion list provided by the next to last paragraph of section 24a of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920: Provided, That said John P. Pence shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to any back pay or allowances of any kind: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall operate to increase the number of officers in the Regular Army now authorized by law.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Washington why the report from the War Department is not included in the committee report?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not able to say. My impression is that the War Department did not object.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill seeks to go over the head of the military authorities and have this man appointed an officer, when under the rules and regulations he could not be appointed an officer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is right about that. The fact is that during the reorganization this man found himself in a post about to be abandoned up at the farthermost point of Alaska. He had a wife and a small child and another about to be born. There was nothing to do but for him to move where he could get medical attendance.

Mr. BLANTON. In view of the splendid service that the gentleman from Washington is doing with reference to naturalization, and in view of the shameful treatment that his own Republican Party gave him on the floor of the House this morning, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman, and I will take care of the other part of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like for the gentleman from West Virginia to state why we are going over the heads of the War Department.

Mr. BOWMAN. We are not going over the heads of the War Department. This bill was drawn in compliance with the request of the War Department.

Mr. BLANTON. The clause which the committee always puts on the bill has been left off, and it ought to be in it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I shall have no objection to that.

Mr. BLANTON. With that understanding, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws, Willis B. Cross shall hereafter be held and considered to have been mustered into the military service of the United States as a private of Captain Miner's Seventeenth Battery, Indiana Volunteer Light Artillery, and to have been honorably discharged.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

Andrews shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably as a private, Company F, Seventh United States Infantry, July 24, 1899; Troop I, Fourth United States Cavalry, August 24, 1906; Three hundred and forty-ninth Infantry, November 15, 1917: Provided, That no back pay or allowance of any kind shall be held to have accrued because of the passage of this act.

GEORGE CALDWELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3724) for the relief of George Caldwell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object at this time—I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] this question. I find in the note that I have the War Department does not recommend favorable consideration of the passage of this bill upon the theory that it might be prejudicial to others and so eliminate them under the circumstances. What is the gentleman's explanation of that?

Mr. SWING. The department does not make affirmative recommendation. The expression is that the War Department does not recommend favorable consideration or the passage of the bill. Many reports on bills come up from the War Department without being affirmative. The department leaves it to the judgment of the committee and Congress.

Mr. HOOPER. I am not intending to object.

Mr. SWING. I think this man had a most remarkable record as a soldier and an officer. His last record was in the World War.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and I want to read into the RECORD a little further statement from the War Department bearing upon a question of policy. Usually these reports from the War Department come from The Adjutant General, but this matter I imagine was deemed of so great importance that the Secretary of War himself made the report. He says:

Manifestly sound policy precludes the reversal, by means of special legislation for the benefit of individuals, of the findings of legally constituted courts, boards, or other administrative agencies, as would be the effect of the passage of this bill. You are aware, of course, that the War Department has consistently maintained an attitude of opposing special legislation for the benefit of individuals and has given its approval only in cases where an obvious injustice had been done or to correct an error of administration. While admittedly adherence to a general policy should not be carried to the point of failure to correct mistakes, I can find nothing of record to indicate that any error or injustice has been committed in this case. The question before the board of general officers which selected him for elimination was one of relative effectiveness and value to the Government of all officers under consideration. Moreover, the beneficiary of this bill, then a captain of Infantry, requested that he be considered by a board of general officers with a view to retirement as a warrant officer, stating that he desired to take over certain business interests. The conclusions of the board are evidenced by its recommendation that Captain Caldwell be eliminated from the active list by reason of usefulness and relative value to the service and the officer's expressed desire for elimination.

There appears to be no reason why the beneficiary, who, in accordance with his expressed preference, was retired as a warrant officer, should be reappointed as captain and immediately placed on the retired list with the rank and retired pay of that grade, to the prejudice of others of that class of former officers eliminated under the same conditions.

This may not appeal to the gentleman's committee, it may not appeal to the Republican leaders here in charge on the floor to-day, but I can not let a report from the War Department like that go by without taking notice of it.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. Perhaps I can say something to cause the gentleman to change his mind. This man came up from the ranks and finally received his commission. It was intimated to him——

Mr. BLANTON. Is he one of the gentleman's constituents?

Mr. GLYNN. No; he is not my constituent.

Mr. BLANTON. In what way is the gentleman interested particularly?

Mr. GLYNN. Because I am on the Committee on Military Affairs, and I want to say this to the gentleman: I talked with the man who was responsible for bringing ammunition for his division to St. Mihiel. He is in the War Department now. He said to me that when he was put in charge he said to his officers, "Here, I do not understand all about bringing up supplies and ammunition, and I want you to get me a man," and they recommended to him this warrant officer, Caldwell.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of trying cases in court or out of court?

Mr. GLYNN. I am in favor of trying cases in court.

Mr. BLANTON. When a case has been tried before a board or a court-martial with witnesses under oath, and the defendant is present with his counsel furnished him by the Government, is that trial of more importance and is the evidence to be given as great probative force and effect as hearsay which the gentleman gets on the outside?

Mr. GLYNN. But mine is not hearsay.

Mr. BLANTON. It was not a court-martial; it was the so-called plucking board. They are of similar procedure. And the War Department says that he said he was going into business and wanted to be retired.

Mr. SWING. He knew what he was up against. He knew that he was going out one way or the other.

Mr. BLANTON. Then he ought to have appealed to my friend from California and let his great influence pervade the War Department in his behalf.

Mr. SWING. Let me make just this one statement and then I shall be very glad to submit it to the gentleman's judgment. This man served well and faithfully as an enlisted man, as a corporal, as a sergeant, and on up. If he had continued as an ordnance sergeant during the World War, on his retirement, at the time he did retire, he would have drawn, according to the best calculation, $138 per month; whereas because he made the change in rank and grade the Government asked of him and took the responsibility of a captain, he has now lost the time that he served as a commissioned officer, and so when he retired as ordnance sergeant he draws only $85.10.

We have penalized him for having rendered extraordinary services.

Mr. BLANTON. So that we will not waste any further time, I hope we can come to an understanding about the matter that will be agreeable to the gentleman from California and will give me an opportunity to find out just exactly whether the Secretary of War does object to the passage of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. GLYNN. Pending that, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. We will save time to pursue the course which I have suggested, because there are many other bills on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know exactly what the gentleman means by his request. The bill remains on the calendar in any event. Does the gentleman mean that it might be called up again to-day?

Mr. BLANTON. I had that in mind, that I might communicate with the War Department and find out what they want. If it does not affect the standing of a lot of officers, as the War Department indicates here, and does not do an injustice to a lot of other officers, I shall not then insist on my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REBECCA R. SEVIER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3730) for the relief of Rebecca R. Sevier.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, the proposed beneficiary has passed from this life, and there is nothing that Congress can do for her relief. I ask that the bill be stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object in order to examine the report from the War Department to see whether or not the bill is correct. The Secretary says:

It is deemed proper to state that the proposed bill is defective in that it does not include a date of entry of the man into the service, such as would give him a period of service of at least 90 days, which, it is understood, is the required number of days for pensionable purposes.

That has been corrected, has it?

Mr. MORIN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I believe, then, the bill is sufficient, and I withdraw my reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

SAMUEL PELFREY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6389) for the relief of Samuel Pelfrey.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas reserves the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice that this is to correct the record of a soldier whose service was rendered in comparatively recent years, not a Civil War service. Why is the report of the War Department omitted from this committee report?

Mr. MORIN. As I understand, this bill was reported at the last session. At this session, I think, the subcommittee in preparing the report has just failed to include last year's report from the department.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by Mr. STROTHER. He is now ill at home, but I know something about the case.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the department report unfavorably upon it?

Mr. HUGHES. They reported favorably upon it. That is what Mr. STROTHER told me. I have not the papers before me. I know the case is a very deserving one.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers of the Volunteer Army, Samuel Pelfrey, who was a member of Company H, Second Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 26th day of September, 1898: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN W. CLEAVENGER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4280) to correct the military record of John W. Cleavenger, deceased.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of calling attention to the report of the War Department, which reads as follows:

The application for removal of the charge of desertion and for an honorable discharge in the case has been denied, and now stands denied, on the ground that the period of the soldier's absence from the service between the date of his desertion from his first enlistment and the date of his second enlistment exceeded four months, which fact precludes favorable action in the case under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, the law governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion in Civil War cases.

Why should the War Department's recommendation be overturned in this case, may I ask the committee? I am afraid the committee has been doing work rather hurriedly in the reporting of all these bills in so short a space of time during this term of Congress. They have gotten up a pretty good calender hurriedly, and it seems to me with very little consideration.

Mr. JAMES. All of these bills are bills that were reported at the last session of Congress, that passed the House but died in the Senate because of the filibuster.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend from Kansas, the author of the bill, is now present. What reason has he to give for overturning the recommendation of the War Department. The War Department says he stood in desertion for four months.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. But he had reenlisted in another branch of the service and served faithfully.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a good reason, I think, why he should have his military record corrected.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is what he did.

Mr. BLANTON. So I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John W. Cleavenger, who was a member of Company B, Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 26th day of April, 1862: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN T. O'NEIL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3737) for the relief of John T. O'Neil.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to read the report of the committee, or a part of it, Mr. Speaker, under a reservation to object. The Committee on Military Affairs in reporting this bill says:

The record shows that O'Neil's dishonorable discharge was the result of a court-martial sentence, finding him guilty of drunkenness, disorderly conduct, and disobedience to orders. The second and third offenses were the result of the first. In addition to dishonorable discharge, O'Neil was sentenced to six months' confinement, and it seems to the committee that imprisonment was a sufficient punishment for the offenses for which O'Neil was found guilty without adding the stigma of a dishonorable discharge.

I would not object as one Member, Mr. Speaker, to removing the stigma from him; but the committee is going to reward him by putting him on the pension list for life, and if in his old age he marries some buxom young widow, she will be placed on the pension list for the rest of her life.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. This is a case where the man had served one term of enlistment and had been honorably discharged. That was during the Spanish-American War. In the second enlistment, when the war was over and when he was in the Regular Army, he got drunk and did those things.

Mr. BLANTON. Then twice subsequently he did wrong, was court-martialed, and punished.

Mr. GLYNN. I do not understand that to be the fact.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the committee report shows.

Mr. GLYNN. They all constitute the same thing. He got drunk and that resulted in the disorderly conduct.

Mr. BLANTON. If a man gets drunk and is guilty of disorderly conduct and disobedience to orders in January and is punished, and then in December next he gets drunk again, is that one continuous performance?

Mr. GLYNN. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the way I understand this report.

Mr. GLYNN. Oh, no; this all happened at the same time. He had already received an honorable discharge for service during the Spanish-American War, and this was a second enlistment in the Regular Army.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman is in favor of putting him on the pension rolls for life?

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I would say this: It has been the policy of the committee that where there is one enlistment with an honorable discharge, but in a subsequent enlistment the man is court-martialed for drunkenness or something growing out of drunkenness, not a serious offense, to recommend that he be given the status of an honorably discharged man.

Mr. BLANTON. We are putting a whole lot of them on the pension list and the list is growing every year. I want to see every man who does honorable service for his country put on the pension list when he needs it. I am in favor of that. I am in favor of paying them the limit, because, unless our country properly takes care of its soldiers when they become old and decrepit, we can not expect proper service from them when the time comes that the country needs them; but we must quit putting these men who have not done honorable service on the pension list.

Mr. GLYNN. But this man had honorable service.

Mr. BLANTON. For how long? During the entire Spanish-American War?

Mr. GLYNN. During the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BLANTON. Did he serve throughout the Spanish-American War and was he then honorably discharged?

Mr. GLYNN. His first service was with the First Regiment, Connecticut Volunteer Artillery, in which he was enlisted June 18, 1898, and from which he was honorably discharged on October 29, 1898.

Mr. BLANTON. A few months' service?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes; a few months' service, and he enlisted again.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not prepared to say that is not a proper bill. So I will withdraw my objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of all laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John T. O'Neil, late of Battery C, First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Artillery, Spanish-American War, shall be held to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States on December 1, 1899: Provided, That no back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES R. STEVENS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 854) for the relief of Charles R. Stevens.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EVANS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute for the bill H. R. 854 the bill H. R. 4013, which is identical with H. R. 854 except that it has the date, November 22, 1864, recommended by the committee, which date does not appear in the bill as printed here.

Mr. BLANTON. Are the bills identical in purpose and in effect?

Mr. EVANS of California. They are identical in purpose and in effect, except the bill H. R. 854 has the date left out; otherwise, they are absolutely the same.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill may be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for information.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Charles R. Stevens, formerly a corporal in Company M, Eleventh Michigan Cavalry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged November 22, 1864, from the military service of the United States in his final service as a corporal in Company M, Eleventh Michigan Cavalry: Provided, That no pension, bounty, pay, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of attempted assault standing against the military record of Richard Brannan, formerly a member of Company D, Nineteenth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of lines 3 to 8, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Richard Brannan, late of Company D, Nineteenth Regiment, United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on November 26, 1900: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Robert Zink, a resident of Illinois, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a musician of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, on the 18th day of July, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the proviso and insert: "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, the language that is omitted and offered by the gentleman from Texas should be in all of these bills. I do not know why it was omitted. In order to save time, I ask unanimous consent that in all bills where it is omitted it may be inserted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. As to the unanimous-consent request by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he asks that this correct language be placed in all of these private bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the better way would be to take it up as each bill is considered.

Mr. MORIN. My only object was to save time.

Mr. BLANTON. The word "back" should be before the word "pay," and in some of the bills it has been left out. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be instructed to correct the provisos in accordance with the language which has been read.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that ought to be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that would not be the orderly method of procedure.

EMILE GENIREUX

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2472) for the relief of Emile Genireux.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and any laws conferring honors, rights, benefits, and privileges upon honorably discharged members of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, their widows and dependent relatives, Emile Genireux, alias Emile Genereux, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from military service of the United States as a private in Company D, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry, on May 9, 1901: Provided, That no back pay, back pension, or other back allowance shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the chairman of the committee if the word "back" should not be inserted before the word "pay"?

Mr. MORIN. It should, and I offer that as an amendment.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELLA G. RICHTER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2808) for the relief of Ella G. Richter, daughter of Henry W. Richter.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Is not this something of a departure—to grant a pension to the adult daughter of a former pensioner?

Mr. MORIN. Within the law it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. What other cases have we?

Mr. MORIN. I do not recall.

Mr. BLANTON. As far as we have ever gone is to extend the right to the widow. If we are going to grant this adult daughter, who was born in 1862, a pension we should extend that privilege under our pension laws to every daughter of every pensioner, but we have not done it so far.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the bill reported. Does this authorize the pension to be paid to an adult daughter of a deceased pensioner?

Mr. LETTS. It does not authorize a pension to be paid to her.

Mr. BLANTON. What does it authorize?

Mr. LETTS. It authorizes the correction of a record.

Mr. BLANTON. And then she will be placed on the pension roll.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Henry W. Richter, who was a member of Company A, Ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 17th day of January, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, reserving the right to object, this bill recites in its preamble that it is—for the relief of Ella G. Richter, the daughter of Henry W. Richter.

Mr. LETTS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And then the bill goes on and provides that—no pension or back pay shall be allowed this woman, Ella G. Richter, who is an adult daughter, except after the passage of this bill.

Just as sure as you pass this bill, the Pension Department is going to hold that this is an instruction to it to place her on the pension roll under her father's service after the passage of this bill.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, the Pension Department could not possibly make a holding of that sort. The Pension Department, to grant a pension under this bill, would have to do it under the general law, and there is no law that allows a pension to the adult daughter of a soldier, unless it should be one who was incapacitated mentally.

Mr. BLANTON. If that is true, may I ask the gentleman if he is willing to agree to an amendment to make this proviso read that no bounty, back, pay, pension, or allowance shall accrue in this case?

Mr. LETTS. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there will be no question about it.

Mr. LETTS. This Ella G. Richter is the only living representative of this ex-soldier.

Mr. BLANTON. Under our agreement, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Line 11, strike out the words "shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act" and insert in lieu thereof "shall be held to have accrued or be allowed in this case."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BERT H. LIBBEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3166) for the relief of Bert H. Libbey, alias Burt H. Libbey.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, because I want to read what The Adjutant General says:

He served therewith until June 20, 1901, when he was transferred to the Eighteenth Battery, Field Artillery, and he deserted from that organization January 31, 1903, at the Presidio of San Francisco, Calif. He remained away from military control until March 20, 1903, when he surrendered at the Presidio. He was tried by a general court-martial at that place and found guilty of desertion, in violation of the forty-seventh article of war, and was sentenced "to be dishonorably discharged the service of the United States, forfeiting all pay and allowances now due, and to be confined at hard labor at such place as the reviewing authority may direct for a period of one year." The sentence was approved August 15, 1903, but in consideration of the long confinement of the accused prior to trial, the confinement awarded was reduced to six months, and as modified the sentence was promulgated in paragraph 3, Special Orders, No. 188, headquarters Department of California, August 20, 1903, Alcatraz Island, Calif., being designated as the place of confinement. Pursuant to the sentence of the court, the soldier was dishonorably discharged from the military service August 22, 1903, at the Presidio of San Francisco, Calif., and he was released from confinement at Alcatraz Island January 14, 1904, with character while in confinement recorded as "Good."

That was nearly two years that he was away.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is mistaken in his conclusion with regard to the length of time that he remained away. It was less than two months.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me see. I was reading what The Adjutant General of the gentleman's United States Army says.

Mr. CARTER. In the report that I have before me it says that he deserted from that organization on January 31, 1903, at the Presidio in San Francisco, and he remained away from military control until March 20 of that year.

Mr. BLANTON. I find that I am in error and the gentleman is correct. My eyes in reading it caught the date of enlistment instead of the date that he was discharged. He was a deserter, then, from January 21, 1903, to March 20, 1903?

Mr. CARTER. That is correct. He was honorably discharged from active service during the time of the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BLANTON. I just wanted his record read. I am not going to take the responsibility of objecting to the consideration of the bill, but it seems to me that the Committee on Military Affairs is getting a little bit careless in its recommendation of these bills.

Mr. CARTER. This man was away for about five weeks, and he returned voluntarily and surrendered himself to military authorities.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Bert H. Libbey, alias Burt H. Libbey, who was a member of Eighteenth

CAPT. GEORGE E. KRAUL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3510) to authorize the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Capt. George E. Kraul a captain of Infantry, with rank from July 1, 1920.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] whether his committee in approving these bills intends to interfere with the regular rules and regulations of the War Department with respect to commissioned officers?

Mr. MORIN. This bill has been approved by the War Department.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that; but that is because the gentleman from Pennsylvania has great influence there, I take it.

Mr. MORIN. No. The bill was sent to me by the War Department, and I introduced it. I have no personal interest in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do they not commission without a special act of Congress?

Mr. MORIN. I guess they have not authority.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do they not commission this man as captain without an act of Congress?

Mr. MORIN. I can not answer.

Mr. BLANTON. Then it is beyond their power, and it needs congressional action to do it?

Mr. MORIN. I believe so.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do we not take from them the function of creating their officers and commissioning them ourselves in exceptional cases? Does the gentleman know of any good reason for taking this action here?

Mr. MORIN. The War Department recommends it.

Mr. BLANTON. They have authority to correct their errors.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. As I understand it, the War Department has corrected the error in the commission of this man as captain, but it dates only from the correction of the error, and the Secretary of War says that he is without legal authority to change the date of this commission, and that if it is the desire of Congress to correct the error it will be necessary to have an authoritative law to do it.

I call my colleague's attention to the fact that this is a different case from just taking a fellow who has already resigned from the Army and commissioning him anew. I am opposed to that kind of a bill. But this man is in the Regular Army and should have been commissioned as of the date stated in this bill, but because of an error which the War Department says was made they ask this action.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, George E. The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the President's physician?

Mr. REECE. No; it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should this man be given the rank of major?

Mr. REECE. I will explain the situation to my friend. This man was too old to be commissioned under the provisions of the general law; that is, too old to qualify for the examination. He is a very eminently qualified physician who served with great distinction during the World War, having been decorated as many as two or three times and wounded in action—an exceptionally fine soldier and physician combined. He is fond of the service and, consequently, would like to have the opportunity of continuing in the service. This bill authorizes the Surgeon General, in the event he finds him qualified and finds other conditions favorable to his appointment, to appoint him with this rank.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose we already have enough majors in the Medical Corps, then what?

Mr. REECE. But the fact is, they are short of officers in the Medical Corps of the Army.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. This bill authorizes the creation of an additional officer of this rank. Let me ask my friend a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to object to it, so there is no use prolonging the agony.

Mr. REECE. The bill passed the House at the last session. I think it is generally understood that they are really short of officers in the Medical Corps.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there are lots of physicians who served honorably on the front-line trenches in France who would like to be commissioned now as majors, and if we are going to start this for one friend of my friend, we will have to continue it for everybody's friends.

Mr. REECE. There are occasionally bills of this nature reported—I do not mean identical bills—and some of them are on the calendar. This leaves the discretion in the executive department and simply grants them the authority to do this in the event they feel it is justified.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know how many high commissioned doctors the Navy now has at the navy yard here at Washington during peace time?

Mr. REECE. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish the gentleman would check that up. I have checked it up.

Mr. REECE. I am not familiar with the personnel of the Navy Department.

Mr. BLANTON. They are in each other's way down there.

Mr. REECE. But the fact remains they need additional officers in the Medical Corps of the Army.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry on my friend's account but I am forced to object. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], one of the most modest men in the House as to his own accomplishments. I can not let further time go by without calling attention to the fact that the other day we passed what was known as the triangle bill. I am sure that no one would detract from the services of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds rendered in the passage of that act, and we are not detracting from their service when I call attention to the fact that this was one of the special pet measures of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Ever since he has been here he has been trying to get this legislation passed. When he first proposed the acquirement of this land in the triangle we could have acquired it for less than $15,000,000. That is all he first proposed to be appropriated at that time. The committee, of which he and I are members, unanimously approved of his bill, but he could not get it passed into law. It would have saved at least $10,000,000 had his bill been passed promptly.

I think he deserves great credit. He is one of the most hard-working, conscientious men in this House, conscientious about every bit of his service. He and I do not always agree. He is a partisan Republican and I am a partisan Democrat, but he deserves great credit in getting his pet legislation through. Of course, there are others who also deserve credit.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will pardon me, I hope he will call attention to the work that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is doing on this calendar as chairman of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I intend to do that. He deserves great credit for that work. There are a few of us here whom, as you gentlemen know, spend much time and do much hard work on the Private and Consent Calendars—close, hard study of these many bills. Since the gentleman from Massachusetts has been chairman of the Committee on Claims he has saved us no end of work that we used to have to do because of the careful scrutiny that he and his committee gives to these private claims.

I felt that this was due him, because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is so modest that he would not let it be known that he was partly the father of the triangle bill.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Pocahontas Fuel Co. (Inc.), a corporation duly organized and having a usual place of business in New York, N. Y., the sums of $1,595.18 and $224.18, in full compensation for property damage done to the coal wharf owned by said corporation at New Bedford, Mass., by the United States Coast Guard cutter Acushnet on April 20, 1926, and January 10, 1927, respectively, as a result of negligence on the part of duly authorized agents of the Treasury Department, Coast Guard Service, in charge of the operation of the said Acushnet.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the words and figures "sums of $1,595.18 and $224.18" and insert the words and figures "sum of $1,200," and on page 2, after the figures 1926 in line 3, strike out the balance of the paragraph.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LEWIS H. FRANCKE AND BLANCHE F. SHELLEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5300) for the relief of Lewis H. Francke and Blanche F. Shelley, sole legal heirs of Ralph K. Warrington.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I see that the bill calls for an amount of $3,453.88. On page 4 of the report, in a letter dated April 11, 1924, by the Judge Advocate of the Army, this statement is made:

The correct amount was shown by the Judge Advocate's memorandum to be $3,092.63, and the Secretary recommended that in the event the bill was passed it should provide for compensation in the latter amount only.

Now, if that is a correct amount and it will be agreed that such amendment be offered, reducing the amount carried in the bill to the amount recommended by the War Department, I shall have no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. If the gentleman will look on page 2 of the report, there is an itemized list of United States currency, $142.63; United States bonds, $1,000; interest at the rate of 4¼ per cent provided on the face of the bonds, $361.25; and Philippine currency in dollars, $1,950.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It is the universal custom, so far as I know, that we do not allow interest against the Government, where it is paying a claim like this one, not because of any legal liability but as an act of grace to the claimant.

Mr. THATCHER. Of course, these were bonds.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That is all very true; but we do not allow interest against the Government, except where it is paying the bonds.

Mr. O'CONNELL. If the matter had taken its ordinary course, the man would get his interest on the bonds anyway.

Mr. THATCHER. Yes. This was a soldier in the Army who was thrifty enough after 20 years of service to have this saving, and when he died it was stolen by the paymaster's clerk.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The ordinary course in a matter of redemption of bonds is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate of the bond and require the claimant to himself execute a bond reimbursing the Government if the original bond shows up for payment. But we are not requiring that in this case, and the probabilities are that the Government has already paid the interest.

Mr. THATCHER. I do not think so.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, it is probable that the Government has paid that interest to some illegal holder of the original coupon bond, and if we adopt this course and pass this bill as now drawn it would mean that the Government of the United States will be paying twice, and I could not consent to that. Unless the gentleman agreed to the amendment, to the amount suggested by the War Department, I shall have to object.

Mr. THATCHER. Of course, I do not want to have the matter go over a second time. At the last session it went to the Senate and there died.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And I am not arbitrary in this. The gentleman will see that if this bill is passed in its present form the probabilities are that the Government would pay interest twice on the bond.

Mr. THATCHER. Not unless it paid the bond itself.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And that is what they probably have done, if it was a coupon bond.

Mr. THATCHER. Of course, if the gentleman insists, I shall accept the amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I shall insist on the amendment, and I withdraw the objection upon that understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill with the understanding that that amendment will be agreed to.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full compensation against the Government, the sum of $3,453.88 to Lewis H. Francke and Blanche F. Shelley, of Louisville, Ky., the sole legal heirs of the late George A. Francke, who served as Ralph K. Warrington, formerly clerk, Medical Department of Large, United States Army, and who died intestate on March 1, 1919, for the loss of personal property belonging to the said deceased, through and by the theft and conversion at the hands of an employee of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, on line 6 of the bill, I move to strike out the figures "$3,453.88" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,092.63."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$3,453.88" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,092.63."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ROLAND M. BAKER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5338) for the relief of Roland M. Baker.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Why could not the Post Office Department authorities approve of this claim if it be just?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Post Office authorities sent in this claim with the very same report that they send in on all similar claims, that is, that they do not oppose.

Mr. BLANTON. They are authorized to settle claims of this character are they not?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. This is for $1,756. The Post Office Department has authority to settle it if it saw fit and thought it was just. Why are they sending it to Congress?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; that is where a burglary occurs, and not where a theft of this kind occurs.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, this is just a shortage in accounts?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. How do we know that this was produced by a theft?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The chief reason for it is that the bonding company paid the bond of $5,000 for this Murray, and that is pretty good proof.

Mr. BLANTON. It was an embezzlement, pure and simple?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; it was not a burglary.

Mr. BLANTON. What has become of the embezzler?

Mr. UNDERHILL. He was punished.

Mr. BLANTON. By a fine or imprisonment?

Mr. UNDERHILL. By imprisonment. He served one year and one day in a house of correction.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the Government of the United States fared much better in the courts of this State than it has been doing here in Washington, respecting criminals who have defrauded it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to credit the account of Roland M. Baker, postmaster at Boston, Mass., in the sum of $1,756.89. Such sum represents the amount of a deficit in the account of the said Roland M. Baker caused by the embezzlement on or about June 8, 1922, of postal funds by an employee at the North Postal Station, Boston, Mass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Biddle in the amount of $1,320 in accordance with an agreement heretofore reached between the said parties.

JOHN ROOKS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8093) for the relief of John Rooks.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves $5,588.89, covering a period from June 30, 1924, to October 30, 1925. I do not think the committee has made a proper showing here to warrant our passing the bill under unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This is a case which occurs occasionally in carrying on operations in the United States. One of these men was overlooked. He served faithfully, and he ought to have his money.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman given the case his personal attention?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And he thinks it is just?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

FRED A. KNAUF

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to H. R. 6254, a bill for the relief of Fred A. Knauf.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to H. R. 6254. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will state to my colleague that the reason I objected to this bill was that it involves $141,433.82, and I thought it was entirely too large an amount to be passed here in a few seconds. If the gentleman wants to make a statement about the bill, I shall not object to his making his statement and getting his reasons in the RECORD, but I shall be forced to object to the consideration of the bill. However, I shall not object to returning to the bill for the purpose of permitting the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. This bill was carefully considered by the Claims Committee and has the favorable recommendation of the department. The gentleman does not take the attitude that he is going to hold the postmaster to account for an amount stolen by a bank robber, especially when the Postmaster General directs the postmasters to keep a nine months' supply of stamps on hand.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend from Wisconsin usually objects to them himself when they get up to $10,000, but when it happens to be a postmaster from his State, where the amount is $141,000, he does not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. No; "the gentleman from Wisconsin" has never objected to a similar bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall be forced to object to the bill coming up, but if the gentleman wants to make a statement I shall not object.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to object even after the statement is made?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; because it involves too much money to be passed here now; but, as I say, I shall not object to the gentleman's request to return to this bill for the purpose of making a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been the custom not to object to the consideration of a bill if no objection is made to the request to return to the consideration of a bill. That has generally been considered in the same request.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has been the custom in the House when requests are made to return to bills out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object; but to clarify the matter, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KADING. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that this bill was passed by the House in the Sixty-ninth Congress; its purpose is to reimburse, or rather to correct the record on the books of Mr. Knauf, the postmaster at Sheboygan, Wis., in the matter of his loss when the post office at Sheboygan was robbed on October 17, 1925. The gentleman from Texas at the time the bill was on the calendar in the Sixty-ninth Congress reserved the right to object, and my predecessor, Mr. Voigt, made the statement on the floor, in substance, that the loss of cash was only $107, and that the balance consisted of postage stamps, canceled and uncanceled; that Sheboygan was a city of about 40,000 population; that the post office there furnished stamps to surrounding smaller places; that the bill had the recommendation of the Post Office Department and the recommendation of the committee. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] then withdrew his objection and the bill was passed, but failed to be reached in the Senate in the jam of the business of that body in the closing days of the Sixty-ninth Congress. This bill now has the same recommendations of both the Post Office Department and the Committee on Claims. The situation is the same now as it was when the House passed the bill in the Sixty-ninth Congress. I sincerely hope that the gentleman will now withdraw his objection and permit the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the amount is $141,000, and I want time to refer to my notes in my office before it comes up, and for the present I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to speak out of order for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Texas will carefully reconsider his decision upon this matter.

This bill comes out of the Committee on Claims with a unanimous vote and was carefully considered by that committee. It has a favorable recommendation from the Post Office Department. Over 50 per cent of the stolen stamps were canceled stamps and can not be used again or sold for postage stamps. The report of the committee clearly shows that the large amount of stamps on hand in this post office had been placed there by the postmaster upon the request and under the regulations of the Postmaster General. It further shows that this post office supplies smaller post offices.

I know if this bill were as vicious a bill as the gentleman from Texas believes it may be, it would not have been passed at the last session of Congress, because we know the gentleman from Texas is always on the job guarding the Treasury and looking after the financial interests of the people and protecting the Treasury from unwarranted appropriations. I listened to the wonderful oration the gentleman from Texas made a few moments ago about the distinguished chairman of our Committee on Claims. We appreciate it. I agree with the gentleman on many of the things that he mentioned, and I believe after listening to that oration the gentleman should have sufficient confidence in the chairman of our Committee on Claims and the rest of the members of that committee, especially in view of the fact that during the last session of Congress this bill was passed unanimously, to withdraw his objection and let this meritorious bill be passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I only want time to look at my notes in my office; and if the gentleman will wait, I will tell the gentleman my conclusions later on.

Mr. SCHAFER. We know the gentleman from Texas is on the floor of the House upon every unanimous-consent day, and we know that if this bill passed the House at the last session, as it did, the gentleman's notes will reveal the fact that the bill is O. K. or it would not have been passed, because any bill that has not merit would not pass this House with the consent of the gentleman from Texas. I hope the gentleman will reconsider his decision.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I shall object, in view of the fact that this bill is the bill of the distinguished Speaker pro tempore now presiding, but I want to call the attention of the House to what the Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War, says about this bill. He gives a number of reasons why it should not pass, and then he says:

I therefore recommend that H. R. 7540 be not favorably considered by your committee and be not enacted into law.

However, our friend from New York [Mr. SNELL] has such power and influence that he can get the bill reported in spite of that recommendation, and I shall not stand in the way of its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to what the War Department says. Maj. Gen. Robert T. Davis, the Adjutant General, says in his report on this case:

It is seen from his own statement in the letter referred to that the cause of his failure to return to his command and complete his term of enlistment was not that he was suffering from physical disability incurred in the line of duty, but rather that he was afraid to return on account of punishment that he expected he would suffer on his return to his command. Under these circumstances the charge of desertion of September 8, 1863, against him can not be removed under any of the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, the only law in force governing the subject of the removal of charges of desertion in Civil War cases.

That is the report of the War Department; but I shall not object.

RETIREMENT STATUS OF BRIG. GEN. H. M. LORD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7926) to place a retired officer of the Army on the retired list as a major general.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire what is the necessity for creating another major general on the retired list?

Mr. JAMES. This takes care of Brigadier General Lord, Director of the Budget. General Lord was Chief of Finance and at that time was a brigadier general. He was drafted by the President and asked to resign as a brigadier general in the Army and as Chief of Finance and become head of the Bureau of the Budget, which he did. A short time after that his successor was promoted from brigadier general to major general, and if General Lord had stayed there he would have been a major general. It does not give him any increase in compensation as long as he is Director of the Budget. If ever a man has earned the reward of major general on the retired list it is General Lord.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does not the gentleman think it is rather presumptuous for this House to place General Lord on the retired list as a major general when we are at this very moment overlooking emergency officers who served in combat divisions and spilled their blood on the battle field?

Mr. JAMES. General Lord was in the Army as a brigadier general and was drafted by the Commander in Chief of the Army to accept a more responsible position. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has the Secretary of War approved of this?

Mr. JAMES. It has not been referred to the Secretary of War for the reason that any bills that are referred to the War Department automatically go to the Director of the Budget, and, of course, we would not want the Director of the Budget to pass on his own bill. I have, however, taken up the matter with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. MADDEN] and the ranking Democratic member of that committee [Mr. BYRNS]. I talked with both of them before the bill was introduced.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the gentleman realize that most of the special bills making majors out of captains on the retired and active list and captains out of lieutenants come back from the War Department with adverse recommendation, and they come back from the Budget Bureau with adverse recommendations, with the statement that such contemplated action is not in conformity with the financial policy of the present administration.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But we pass most of those bills.

Mr. SCHAFER. Only once in a while.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know of any man connected with the Government who has rendered more valuable service to the Nation than General Lord, both as Chief of Finance during the war and as Director of the Budget. I say that advisedly because I have had occasion and opportunity to know something of his good work and the splendid service he has rendered. As the gentleman from Michigan doubtless has stated, the officer who is now holding the position of Chief of Finance in the Army is a major general in rank. Here is a gentleman who served during the war and rendered distinguished service to the Nation and is rendering even more important service to-day as Director of the Budget, and it does seem to me only an element of fairness and justice to this splendid public servant that he be given the rank which is being held by the officer who was his assistant when he was Chief of Finance.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And if he had stayed in this position he would have been a major general now?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes. If he had remained in the position, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, he would have been a major general.

Mr. SCHAFER. With the sincere hope that this House, which is taking care of a brigadier general and placing him on the retired list as a major general, will give as fair consideration to many of the buck privates who are disabled and have not been taken care of under the present compensation law, and as fair consideration to retirement legislation for the emergency officers of the World War, I will not press my objection.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. O'CONNELL. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] if this is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. JAMES. Yes; it is.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, we have had several bills on the calendar this afternoon not identical with this bill but similar in character. I have objected to each one of them, and I shall feel compelled to object to this one. Of course, when the Private Calendar is reached in the regular way, if it is the judgment of the House to take up bills affecting individual officers in the Army in this manner and deal with them in a legislative way and pass them, that rests within the judgment of the House; but I do not feel I could pursue any degree of consistency at all if, having objected to the other bills—not identical, but similar in character—I should not object to this one.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JAMES. Neither of the other cases are identical with this one. The other cases are where men went out of the Army of their own accord and are now trying to get in. This is a case where a man was in the Army and would have stayed in the Army if the President himself, as Commander in Chief of the Army, had not practically drafted General Lord to succeed General Dawes. So it is an entirely different case.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman no one entertains a higher opinion of General Lord and his services to the Government than I do, and when regular Private Calendar day is reached, if in the judgment of the House it wants to pass this bill in the regular way, I shall not object; but I have objected to these other bills that have taken up individuals by name, some of them, and others by classification, and undertaken to deal with them in a legislative way. I have objected to each one of those bills and I shall feel compelled to object to this one. At a later date all of these bills will come up again on regular Private Calendar day, and if in the judgment of the House they want to pass some of them and reject others, that can be done.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Does the gentleman not recognize the fact that if this man had maintained the position he held, which he would have done but for the invitation of the President, he would have been promoted automatically?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. All that has been correctly stated, of course. If he had remained in the service, and if he had not been appointed Director of the Budget, undoubtedly he would still be the Chief of Finance and would have been advanced to the rank of major general. I do not dispute that fact.

Mr. BYRNS. My friend does not want to penalize him because as Director of the Budget he has rendered great service. That is what a failure to pass this bill will amount to.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. We had a case this afternoon of a distinguished medical officer who served with distinction and retired voluntarily. So has General Lord retired voluntarily. This bill to which I refer would have Congress to come in and by special act authorize the President of the United States to reappoint this medical officer to the service. I objected to that, and I objected to a number of other bills of a similar character, and I object to this one, not because of any lack of merit on the part of the individuals involved, but because Congress is a legislative and not an administrative body, and is in no position to take up individual officers in the Army and deal with them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The President, being Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States, requested General Lord to accept this position. Would the gentleman expect General Lord to refuse?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I would not, and General Lord is now retired as a brigadier general of the United States. He retired at his rank held at that time. He now holds the important and responsible position of Director of the Budget. It would have been within the province of the President of the United States, I suppose, to have appointed him to the rank of major general before his retirement if he had seen fit to have done so; but he did not do it, and yet Congress, which is not the Commander in Chief of the Army, comes in and undertakes to promote General Lord to the rank of major general, a thing which was not done by the President of the United States, who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The President is not in the habit of promoting men in the Army out of their turn.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Well, why should Congress do that?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. General Lord has passed the time when he would have become major general.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will be compelled to object, but I will reserve my objection to allow the gentleman to make any statement he desires to make.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the use of making a statement if the gentleman has already foreclosed the case?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Of course, the gentleman will understand there will be another day when this bill can be considered without reference to the objection of any one Member, and I prefer it await that time and that it be considered in the regular way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman recall any time when we have called the Private Calendar in any other way?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. This is not a short session, and there will certainly be other Private Calendar days.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this statement irrespective of the notice that objection is to be filed.

If there ever was a man in the military service of the Government, or in any other service of the Government, better entitled to the honor which this bill proposes to confer upon General Lord, I have not known of it. If this should be granted on the basis of the distinguished service rendered by him as Director of the Budget alone, where he has through his genius and foresight and vision and patriotism and integrity rendered the American people a service from the standpoint of dollars so valuable that the Government could not compensate him for it, if it was to be done on the basis of a mercenary plan of payment, in my judgment this bill ought to be given favorable consideration. But we are not trying to pay General Lord in dollars. I would not stoop to offer payment in money, for I am sure General Lord would not accept that; but it is a great distinction for a man to retire from the Government service with the rank of major general in the Army.

If I were a soldier I would not want any greater honor conferred upon me. I remember there was one case where promotion of a general in the Army was proposed upon his retirement to the rank of major general. His service was not such in my judgment as to justify the promotion. I was just as frank to say his promotion was not justified as I am to-day to say that never was anything more justified than the proposal now made.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If General Lord had not accepted the President's suggestion to become Director of the Budget, he would now be drawing about $9,000 a year, but by reason of his having accepted the President's appointment as Director of the Budget he is drawing $10,000.

Mr. MADDEN. True.

Mr. BLANTON. So he has not lost anything financially.

Mr. MADDEN. No; not in dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman in everything he has said about the value of General Lord's services, but the contention of my colleague is that this bill should come up in the regular order later on.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I would like to emphasize this statement. I have just as high regard for General Lord as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], but we have on this calendar this afternoon a number of bills from the Committee on Military Affairs that undertake to deal with individuals in the Army by individual bills, and by this method Congress, through legislation, undertakes to authorize the President to appoint certain individuals to commissions in the Army or to elevate the rank of certain individuals and deal with them in that way. I have objected to them all. I can not see how I can be consistent or observe any degree of consistency if I do not object to this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I would be the last man in the world to ask the gentleman to yield his opinion, for I have more respect for his opinion and for his manhood than I have for that of most men I know. I know his integrity of purpose can not be assailed in any way by anybody. I know that what the gentleman does he does because he considers it to be his conscientious duty, and I make no complaint about my friend in that respect.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In view of the gentleman's consistency, would not this be a proper case in which he could show a distinct honor to the Director of the Budget by excepting him from the common rule? Is not this an exception not to be governed by the general rule?

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will.

Mr. JAMES. All of the bills the gentleman objected to have come from the Committee on Military Affairs, and in the cases to which the gentleman objected they were all men who voluntarily retired from the Army. General Lord did not voluntarily retire. He was not a candidate for Director of the Budget. He was satisfied where he was. The Commander in Chief of the Army drafted him for this position. His case is not like the others.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If I was able to make the same clear distinction that the gentleman seems to make in his own mind, I would withdraw the objection; but in view of the fact that I am unable to see such a distinction and that this bill will have ample opportunity for consideration in the House on regular Private Calendar Day, and doubtless be passed by the House, I shall adhere to my objection.

DISBURSING AGENTS OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

The next business on the Private Calendar was House Joint Resolution 135, for the relief of special disbursing agents of the Alaska Railroad.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of R. D. Chase, formerly a special disbursing agent of the Alaska Railroad, with amounts heretofore disallowed in said accounts, covering payments made for service and supplies, team hire, and transportation, furnished tie and timber contractors under agreements providing that payment therefor should be made by the railroad, amounting to $3,330.22; and payments for rubber boots furnished, not shown to have been intended for sale to employees, amounting to $252.75; and to credit the accounts of Leslie Cramer, special disbursing agent, with payments covering the services of a detective agency, amounting to $1,197.25; payments for articles not purchased under the General Supply Schedule, amounting to $49.96; payments for materials not purchased from the lowest bidder, amounting to $311.88; and items aggregating $956 disallowed under a provision in purchase agreements relating to liquidated damages; and the said payments are hereby validated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That completes the Private Calendar.

RICHARD B. BARNITZ

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 92.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 92. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object. That was the bill I objected to.

Mr. FISH. Will not the gentleman reserve his objection in order that I may make a statement?

Mr. BLANTON. We have all been working here all day and working hard. I shall be glad to consider any statement that the gentleman wants to send me on the bill. But I object to its consideration to-day.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

The SPEAKER. House bill (H. R. 8824) to provide for the protection of the watersheds in the Carson National Forests from which water is obtained for the Taos Pueblo, N. Mex., was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. It belongs properly to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and both chairmen having agreed, the Chair will so refer it.

House bill 8524 to regulate and fix rates of pay for certain employees of the Bureau of Standards was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The Chair thinks it more properly belongs to the Committee on the Civil Service; and both chairmen have consented and the Chair will so refer it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. DEAL, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. BLAND), was given leave of absence on account of illness.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for three days on account of important family necessity.

THE CONDITION OF JEWS IN RUMANIA

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a resolution that I introduced in the House and a speech made in the House regarding this subject and also to incorporate a letter received from the minister of Rumania to me and my reply to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House. On December 12, 1927, I introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives calling upon Calvin Coolidge to intercede in the name of humanity against the outrageous treatment of Rumania against its racial minorities and particularly the Jewish people, and failing in that to bring about the abrogation of the treaties between the Kingdom of Rumania and the Government of the United States.

On December 20, 1927, while speaking on the alien custodian bill I concluded my speech in the House of Representatives by saying:

Through the passage of this alien property bill we are not assisting the Imperial Government of Germany, but we are coming to the rescue of Germany that has given to the world such eminent names as Goethe, Schiller, Heine, Lessing, Kant, Schopenhauer, Erlich, Hahnemann, Wassermann, Koch, Einstein, Wagner, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Holbein, and Karl Marx, men whose names are famous in the rôles of science, art, literature, philosophy, medicine, economics, music, and painting. To the nation that has produced such wonderful scholars America is proud to welcome them in the forefront of the civilized nations of the world. [Applause.]

Another reason for my voting for this alien property bill, which provides for the settlement of claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the legitimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for an equitable apportionment among all claimants of funds due to them, is the fact that the Republic of Germany has treated its racial minorities with the most magnanimous, humane, tender, and sympathetic consideration. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues in the House, I hereby serve notice upon the membership of this historic body that when the claims of Hungary and Rumania shall come before this House I shall raise my voice in mighty protest not to grant to these nations any consideration from this great Republic of ours, because of the outrageous treatment that Rumania and Hungary are according its racial minorities, and shall arraign Hungary and Rumania before the bar of the public opinion and the conscience of our country as nations that are outlaws in the family of humanity and unworthy of any consideration, because of the inhuman and barbarous treatment they have accorded to the Jewish citizens of those nations.

In this the twentieth century of civilization the time has come when we Americans, liberty loving as we are, shall raise our voices, through the membership of this House, that religious intolerance and religious bigotry practiced through pogroms, massacres, and persecutions must cease. In the name of the people of the United States and in behalf of the fourteenth congressional district of New York, which I have the honor to represent in Congress, I demand that the Hungarian and Rumanian Governments grant equal political protection to all of its subjects under its jurisdiction and, above all, at once stop the barbarous and cruel treatment of innocent Jewish citizens and protect their life and property, in accordance with the covenants of existing treaties between the Kingdoms of Hungary and Rumania and the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Since that time through the instrumentality of that brilliant and distinguished constitutional lawyer, Mr. Louis Marshall, the great patriarch and leader of the Jewish people of the United States, we have held several conferences with his excellency the Hon. George Cretziano, the minister of Rumania, regarding the inhuman treatment accorded the Jewish people in Rumania. We told his excellency that the position of the Jew in Rumania has always been a delicate one—treated as aliens in the land of their birth, denied enfranchisement as citizens of Rumania, refused admission to many of the learned professions, for many years prior to the Great War prohibited by governmental order from engaging in certain definite trades and businesses, and, above all, persecuted in the land to which they had given their lifeblood.

Recently the civilized world was amazed to read of the atrocities and inhuman treatment perpetrated by certain elements of the Rumanian students upon Jewish subjects of Rumania. Humanity was shocked, indeed, to read of the attacks upon the Jewish people and their property, the shameful desecration of their houses of worship and synagogues, the disturbances of their places of burial, and the physical indignities to which the Jewish citizens were subjected. In view of these happenings it is a refreshing commentary on the advance of civilization that the accredited representative of that great power, the Kingdom of Rumania, His Excellency George Cretziano, does not seek to deny the misdeeds of some of its individual citizens, but instead manfully regrets their occurrence, professes profound sorrow concerning the outrageous treatment against them, and through his government is anxious to make adequate amends to the victims of such unfortunate tragedies, coupled with the authorized assurances from his Government to the civilized world that such shocking incidents will never again be tolerated in the pale of its jurisdiction.

It affords me therefore very great pleasure to testify personally to the gracious and courteous manner in which his excellency the Hon. George Cretziano cooperated with Louis Marshall and myself by promising that such intolerable and inhuman conditions will never again be tolerated by the Government of Rumania. I take this opportunity of thanking the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the membership of this House for having granted me unanimous consent to insert the correspondence between his excellency the Hon. George Cretziano and myself, which is as follows:

RUMANIAN LEGATION,
Washington, D. C., January 7, 1928.

The Hon. Dr. WILLIAM I. SIROVICH,
Member of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SIROVICH: It has come to my knowledge that you have introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution asking the American Government to abrogate the treaties now existing between the United States and my country and to intervene in behalf of the Jewish minorities of my country. I consider it my duty to give you information which will prove to you that my Government, far from encouraging anti-Semitic disturbances, has taken all the measures to punish the guilty, to indemnify the victims, and to avoid a repetition of similar occurrences without waiting for any outside suggestion or intervention on the part of a foreign government or parliament.

I can not help feeling that, far from bringing about a happy and lasting solution of this problem, action such as you have advocated is likely to react unfavorably upon the Rumanian Jews themselves, for not only the Rumanian Government and people but even Jews, who are striving to establish a better understanding between the Jewish and Rumanian population, would resent even a suggestion of the immission of a foreign power in the internal affairs of their country. In my opinion, cooperation between the Jews of the United States and the Government of Rumania, which is moved by a sincere desire to permanently remedy the situation, would be of far more service to accomplish the common purpose that we have in view.

By frankly facing the situation and calmly analyzing the facts, a via media to remove all causes of friction and to establish harmony in the future among the various races and creeds within the Rumanian Nation may be found which will redound to the mutual satisfaction of all parties concerned.

Now what are the facts? A body of students, taking advantage of the state of depression created in the country by the sudden disappearance of a powerful personality, the late I. I. C. Bratianu, got out of hand, and before the authorities had time to mobilize adequate forces to cope with an unanticipated situation caused serious disorder accompanied by acts of violence at Oradea Mare, Cluj, and other places in Rumania. The actual occurrences were disgraceful and in every way unjustifiable. The press on this side of the Atlantic published articles from sources unfriendly to Rumania in Budapest and other parts of central Europe, which were exaggerated. The truth is that, while a considerable number of individuals were maltreated and a number of synagogues and their contents desecrated and damaged, in spite of reports to the contrary happily no lives were lost.

These incidents are very regrettable, and the Rumania Government not only deplores them but swiftly took measures to punish those officials who were found negligent and to make reparation for the damage done. The prefect of Oradea Mare and the police prefects of Oradea Mare and Cluj were immediately dismissed, and 400 students were arrested on their return to Bucharest. In addition to this, their cases were referred to the military court and, according to telegraphic information received from my government, a first series of offenders has been tried by a court-martial for theft and devastation during the anti-Jewish riots at Oradea Mare on December 6, and have been sentenced variously to from 10 days to 5 months in jail. The senate of the Rumanian universities has expelled forever from all Rumanian universities the students proved guilty of theft, profanation, and devastation, while those found guilty of lesser offenses will be expelled for one year. Those holding scholarships will forfeit their subsidies. The government has introduced a bill in parliament for an appropriation to indemnify Mr. Keller, an American citizen, who was injured, and to restore the synagogues to their previous state. No government can do more by way of reparation for such misdeeds under the circumstances.

Rumania has been accused repeatedly of anti-Semitism. So far as the people of Rumania as a whole are concerned, this charge is unwarranted. There are, unfortunately, individual agitators who for selfish reasons have sought to spread this hateful disease, regardless of the blot that they are placing upon the good name and the honor of Rumania. It is significant that those Jews who recognized the virtue of speaking and acting with moderation and who really understand the people of Rumania commend their good sense, their peaceful nature, and the freedom from religious intolerance, and are convinced that the majority of Rumanians are entirely free from anti-Semitism.

I can personally assure you of the correctness of this observation. Anti-Semitism is practically limited to a portion of the students in institutions of higher learning, to a few of their teachers, and to a small number of unscrupulous politicians. The latter have adopted a platform based on falsehoods and prejudice and calculated to mislead the student body into cooperating for the exploitation of a falsely conceived patriotism. There is also a theory of an economic nature, which has created ill-will among various of the students and has afforded a pretext for hostile demonstrations by them.

The Government is in every way opposed to these mischievous theories and to the lawless acts committed by those who entertain them and is determined to afford protection to every part of the population. This is evidenced by the fact that during the past few months additional Jewish schools have been accorded rights as public schools, an order which forbade the closing of Jewish schools on the Jewish Sabbath has been repealed, orthodox Jewish students who attend public schools have been excused from writing on Saturdays, Jews have been elected to membership in all municipal councils for which elections have been recently held, provisions have been made in the budgets of municipal councils for subventions for the support of schools maintained by the Jewish communities.

With the exception of the recent deplorable occurrences, street attacks upon Jews have ceased, and there has been no exclusion of them from places of amusement. In the Rumanian Parliament preceding that now in office there were 10 anti-Semitic deputies. In the present Parliament there is not one. On the other hand, the Jews are now represented by 10 deputies and senators, in addition to the grand rabbi of Rumania, who, under the constitution, is a life member of the Senate. The Jews have a large representation not only in Rumanian commerce and industry but also in the liberal professions. They are not barred from holding public office or from receiving commissions in the army. They actually hold a large number of both. In the United States, where Rumania has four consulates, there is one Jewish consul; a Jew is in charge of a second consulate. On the staff of the Rumanian Legation in Washington the bookkeeper and archivist is a Jew. The newly created consulate in New Jersey is to be in charge of another Jew.

Much has been said concerning agitation in Rumania by the anti-Semitic party for the establishment of the so-called numerus clausus in respect to the admission of Jewish students to institutions of higher learning. In fact, the contention was made at a meeting held in Washington in February last that, so far as Jewish students in Rumania are concerned, it is not the numerus clausus which prevails but numerus nullus. As bearing upon this charge, permit me to call your attention to the following official figures:

The total number of students in Rumanian universities and high schools is 24,729, of which 20,499 are Christians and 4,230 Jews, divided as follows:

	Christians	Jews
University of Bucharest	12,535	2,357
Commercial Academy, Bucharest	391	104
Polytechnic, Bucharest	804	110
University of Jassy	3,188	1,175
University of Cluj	2,141	159
Commercial Academy, Cluj	256	7
University of Cernautzi	624	262
University of Oradea Mare	215	47
Polytechnic, Timisoara	345	9

These figures tell their own story.

It is a source of pride to Rumania that there are few countries in the world where the so-called minorities, and especially the Jews, receive better opportunities for education and self-development, according to their own ideas and principles, than Rumania. To-day these minorities have more schools in the newly acquired portions of the Rumanian Kingdom than they had under the governments of which they formerly constituted a part. When Transylvania was a part of Hungary there was not a single Jewish public school or high school in that territory. To-day there are 59 elementary schools in the old kingdom, 35 in Transylvania, 2 in Bucovina, and 48 in Bessarabia. The number of secondary schools in the old kingdom is 7, in Transylvania 8, in Bucovina 4, and in Bessarabia 21. The Jews, with a population of less than a million, also have 1,500 synagogues in Rumania.

It should also be noted that Rumania has become a party to and has accepted the terms of the minority treaty entered into at Paris on December 9, 1919, has incorporated them in principle in her constitution, and is firmly resolved to exert all her sovereign power to accord to all of her inhabitants the equal protection of the laws which she has guaranteed to the several racial, religious, and linguistic minorities.

The Government is firm in its determination to put an end to the anti-Semitic agitation which has prevailed among the students and to prevent any recurrence of the recent happenings. It is hoped that all American Jews who have at heart the well-being of their Rumanian coreligionists would cooperate in bringing about a complete understanding between them and the non-Jews of Rumania. This, I am sure, will be welcomed by them, and will redound to the advantage of both, as well as of Rumania.

A prominent Jewish observer, Mr. Herman Bernstein, in a series of articles which he published in the Jewish Tribune on his return from Rumania a few months ago, declared himself satisfied that "the Rumanian people are really not anti-Semitic," and pointed out that the anti-Jewish agitations are purely artificial and are carried out by a handful of students under the leadership of two or three second-rate politicians, who were officially and publicly disapproved by their political friends and colleagues. (See the Jewish Tribune of December 23, 1927.)

I am happy to state that that able man, one of the greatest American Jews, Mr. Louis Marshall, is in complete accord with my views when he pleads for moderation and for a cool examination of the situation of the Rumanian Jews. His efforts coincide with mine, namely, that by a friendly cooperation much more good can be accomplished than by exaggerations, denunciations, and injudicious protests.

You will recognize the desirability of giving the fullest publicity to this statement. The sincerity of your motives can not be questioned. It is easy to understand the impression made upon your mind by the occurrences which are condemned by every true Rumanian and which naturally aroused your sympathies for your religious brethren. Now that you understand that at the very time when you introduced the resolution the Rumanian Government had given evidence of its determination that such conditions should never again occur and that it had announced its purpose to make full reparation for all damages inflicted, you will not hesitate to accept the assurances which I have herein given.

Yours sincerely,

G. CRETZIANO,
Minister of Rumania.

JANUARY 9, 1928.

His Excellency Mr. GEORGE CRETZIANO,
Rumanian Minister, Washington, D. C.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I am in receipt of your letter of the 7th instant concerning the resolution introduced by me in the House of Representatives for the abrogation of the treaties now existing between the United States and Rumania and for intervention on behalf of the Jewish minorities of Rumania.

I have read and reflected upon what you have said with the utmost care, and wish to express my appreciation for the detailed information given. You have fully appreciated the reason that prompted me to introduce the resolution. It was not hostility to Rumania, but sympathy for my religious brethren and indignation at the recent occurrences which shocked the people of this country and which you have properly characterized.

I accept what you have said regarding the attitude of your Government toward the Jews of Rumania and what it has done and what it intends to do in order to show its abhorrence of the lawlessness of those who were responsible for and participated in the outbreaks referred to as an assurance that the Jews of Rumania will be accorded the equal protection of the laws and equal educational and other opportunities in accordance with the letter and the spirit of the minorities treaty entered into and accepted by Rumania on December 9, 1919. On the faith of what you have said it will afford me pleasure to incorporate the correspondence that has passed between us in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very cordially yours,

WILLIAM IRVING SIROVICH, M. C.

SIXTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF EMANCIPATION

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech that I delivered in this city on January 2, 1928, on the sixty-fifth anniversary of the proclamation of emancipation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered under the auspices of the National Interdenominational Ministerial Alliance of America in the John Wesley A. M. E. Zion Church, Washington, D. C.:

Mr. FISH. It is a great privilege and honor to be selected by the National Ministerial Alliance to speak on this sixty-fifth anniversary of the proclamation of emancipation, one of the greatest charters of American liberties and of human rights in the world. It is meet and proper that the colored people of Washington should assemble to pay tribute to this immortal proclamation which burst the shackles of an oppressed race and sounded the death knell of slavery. It is highly fitting that this great anniversary of human freedom should be celebrated in Washington, for it was in this city that Abraham Lincoln issued that famous proclamation that gave freedom to three and a half million slaves in Southern territory, to be increased by another half million by the adoption of the thirteenth amendment almost two years later.

The city of Washington had been the battle ground on the slavery question for more than 30 years prior to the Civil War, and the Halls of Congress had resounded with bitter and acrimonious debate between the adherents of slavery and the champions of freedom ever since John Quincy Adams first attempted to present the petitions against slavery back in 1835. Senator Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, was brutally assaulted and beaten unconscious in the Senate of the United States while portraying the crimes against Kansas, by a Representative from South Carolina, and verbal combats were the order of the day in the fifties.

The city of Washington is also noted as the birthplace of the first emancipation bill signed by President Lincoln on April 16, 1862. The bill was introduced by Senator Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, and abolished slavery in the District of Columbia, thereby striking off the fetters from 3,000 slaves and tendering compensation to their masters. But the Senators and Representatives from the border States remaining in the Union poured forth their vials of wrath and warning against this long-delayed act of justice and predicted that the passage of the bill would result in the exile or extermination of the freed slaves. Time alone has proved how rash and extravagant were the predictions made by the upholders of that ancient and entrenched institution of slavery.

It is difficult for us living in these days to appreciate the power, aggressiveness, and tenacity of the champions of slavery in their efforts to maintain it against the onward march of justice, humanity, and the free institutions of the Republic. To-day there is no one to raise his voice against the emancipation proclamation, but 65 years ago even the North was lukewarm. Abraham Lincoln was imbued from his childhood with a love of free institutions and human rights, and naturally abhorred human slavery. He said of himself, "I am naturally antislavery. If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong." On September 22, 1862, President Lincoln read the proposed proclamation of emancipation to his Cabinet, stating that he had made a promise to his Maker to issue the proclamation if the rebel army was driven out of Maryland, and now that they were driven out he assumed the entire responsibility for his course of action.

The proclamation received the unqualified approval of the Cabinet and was released for publication in the newspapers September 23, 1862. It provided that on the 1st day of January, 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States shall be then, thence forward, and forever free. Inasmuch as the warning proclamation was not heeded, President Lincoln issued the formal proclamation of emancipation on January 1, 1863, concluding with these words, "And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice, warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God."

Abraham Lincoln found the colored men and women human chattels, and he left them human souls.

A story was told me recently by a person who heard it from James G. Blaine about a free colored barber in the Capitol who was trying to save $800 to buy the freedom of his wife and three children. One day Mr. Blaine asked him if he had saved enough money and he said, "Oh, yes; I've got $550, and the massa will sell for $500, but colored folks are cheap now with this war going on and I'se not going to buy." That barber had foresight and kept the money to provide for his family after they were manumitted.

The progress and development of the colored race in the United States since the emancipation proclamation is one of the most remarkable achievements in all history. Three and a half million slaves with no money, no education, destitute of everything, have not only survived all hardships but have increased to eleven and a half millions of free American citizens, and in most States of the Union they have an average education equal to that of some of the more ancient countries and an average wealth far exceeding many of the nations of the world. There is still much to be desired for the advancement and betterment of the colored people, particularly in the South. They constitute one-tenth of the population in the United States, and where they have an equal opportunity for education they are a law-abiding and patriotic people. All the colored people ask is an equal right to educate their children, to work for wages and enjoy the fruits thereof, to own property, and be afforded the protection of the laws and the Constitution for their civil rights, property, and lives. They ask justice, no more and no less, and the wonderful progress they have made in two generations entitles them to equal rights and equal opportunities under our republican form of government.

The most important lesson that the colored people have learned since emancipation is the dignity of free labor—that life was labor and that labor was life. The splendid industrial schools like Hampton and Tuskegee have turned out thousands of intelligent, trained agriculturists and mechanics, and higher institutions of learning, such as Howard and Fisk send forth annually young men trained for business and professional careers. There is room for many more industrial schools in the South for colored boys and girls, to be made useful, productive, valuable members of the community. There is much illiteracy of both whites and blacks in some sections of the South, and the sooner it is attended to the better it will be for the prosperity of the South. Every dollar spent for the educational and industrial improvement of the negro will come back a hundredfold. The abolition of slavery was not an injury to the South but a great benefit, and its industrial system has a far stronger foundation and a much greater prosperity than ever before.

The negro has not only demonstrated his capacity to labor for his living in a free market but to create wealth and accumulate property. The colored population have increased in a state of freedom threefold in 65 years, or at the same rate as the white population, which have been added greatly to by immigration. It is manifest, as both races have lived peacefully together since emancipation and both have prospered and increased, that the future will show a continuation of the remarkable progress, and that 65 years hence, in 1993, there will in all probability be 35,000,000 colored people in America enjoying equal rights and opportunities in all trades and professions, and having more of their own banks, industries, literature, music, opera houses, golf clubs, political organizations, and Members of Congress. Much of this we will see in our day and generation, and although it is not given to us to unveil the future, but judging it from the progress made in the past, the destiny of the colored race in America is not only secure but it is exceedingly bright.

A recent development has been the influx of colored people into the large industrial cities of the North. New York has over 200,000; Chicago and Philadelphia, 150,000; Washington and Baltimore, 125,000; whereas New Orleans, with 100,000, is the only southern city that has any such numbers. It would not be surprising if New York and Chicago had half a million negro population in another score of years, consequently the so-called negro question is no longer essentially a southern question, but affects the industrial North as well as the agricultural South. It will be solved in the North on the basis of justice, and eventually in the South on the same basis, as that is the only solution that will be lasting and bring about mutual cooperation between the two races.

There are three bills pending in Congress in which the colored people are primarily interested; one, the well-known antilynching bill—and if

I had my way I would place machine guns in all the jails in localities where lynchings have occurred and place the responsibility on the sheriff and his subordinates to use them against any lawless mob, black or white, trying to interfere with the course of justice. I believe and want to believe that the decent, law-abiding men and women of the South are as much opposed to mob violence, lawlessness, and lynching as we in the North, and that each year will see a diminution of this national disgrace.

Then there is the bill seeking a grant of land for the erection of a memorial building here in Washington where the colored people could exhibit their progress in the arts and sciences and erect monuments to their famous men, such as Frederick Douglass, Booker T. Washington, and to the benefactors of their race, such as Lincoln, Garrison, Sumner, and, I hope, Robert Gould Shaw, colonel of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts Colored Infantry, who gave up his young life in a gallant attempt to storm Fort Wagner.

The other bill introduced by me seeks to provide for a monument in France to commemorate the bravery and heroism of the colored soldiers of the Ninety-third Division who paid the supreme sacrifice. Having served with colored troops during the World War I can say without fear of contradiction that the colored soldiers, if properly trained, equipped, and led are the equal of any soldiers of any army for military qualities and bravery on the field of battle. The history of all our wars proves the fighting qualities of the negro soldier, and the patriotism and loyalty of the colored people.

The National Alliance of colored ministers are to be commended for their splendid Christian efforts to reconcile the differences between the two races and bring about a maximum of friendly cooperation for the best interests of peace, progress, and prosperity among all the American people.

We have met here to-day not merely to celebrate the sixty-fifth anniversary of the proclamation of emancipation, but also to rejoice over the glorious progress and the splendid destiny of the colored race in the United States, and to reaffirm our faith in free institutions and our republican form of government.

The destiny of the colored race is in their own hands and through their own efforts. They do not seek charity or special privileges; all they ask is justice, more justice, and still more justice to help in wiping out the economic, civic, and racial inequalities and discriminations.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 52) submitted by Mr. McMASTER, favoring a reduction of tariff schedules and the consideration of tariff legislation at the present session of Congress.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the resolution offered by the junior Senator from South Dakota and which favors such revision of the tariff in this session of Congress as will afford a better balance as between great and powerful industry on the one hand and agriculture and smaller business enterprise on the other has provoked a most interesting debate.

The debate shows an awakening of the Senate to the real existence of a tremendous element of dissatisfaction throughout America—a dissatisfaction that promises a great element of misfortune for the political party which longer ignores the appeal for a new order that will find the favors of government showered alike upon all people and all sections of the country.

I shall not at this time argue with those who contend that the resolution is not choice at this time. I want only to say that it sounds and expresses clearly the frame of mind of that great element of our population residing upon farms and in communities which find their prosperity or adversity in agriculture. It is a frame of mind which statesmen recognize and which politicians had best contend if they would save the lives of their parties. These dissatisfied people are not going to listen to all the little niceties which can be uttered in support of the present tariff structure. They want a balance in the economic field, a balance which the present order makes impossible. They want and will demand that privileges afforded by the tariff be fairly distributed. They want and will demand that if industry shall be artificially propped up to a higher plane that all industry and labor shall be given equally favorable and helpful props. They want and demand a fair balance. How they get it does not matter much. If the only way remaining for them to win that fair balance is to pull all industry down onto the economic plane occupied by themselves they will not hesitate to use their influence to help pull industry off its high horse. That is what can fairly be expected if the present order is permitted to prevail.

Listening to the debate upon this question one finds that the opponents of the resolution are assuming the "leave-well-enough-alone" attitude. Leave things alone; do not rock the boat; do not upset the present order which is giving America the most brilliant days of her career!

I realize that it is most unpopular to differ with this contention that we are enjoying a greater prosperity to-day than ever before, but I can not see it to be much short of criminal to fool ourselves longer into the belief that all is well and just as it ought to be. There may be prosperity rampant in certain quarters, but to declare that prosperity is general is to declare falsely. The economic balance or lack of balance really existing is alarming to say the least, and is generally considered so by unprejudiced minds.

There has been called to my attention an editorial appearing in the current issue of the weekly paper known as Labor, which I am going to ask the Senate to listen to at this time:

> Dr. William E. Dodd, one of the great historians of this country and professor of American history at the University of Chicago, spoke in Washington the other night on the question: "Shall American farmers become peasants?"
>
> It was one of the sharpest challenges and warnings ever given from a responsible source in a Nation's Capital. Tillers of the soil in other ages and countries have been peasants, said Doctor Dodd: "dust feet," as the Greeks called them. Are ours doomed to the same fate? They seem headed that same way.
>
> They have been "deflated" for the third time in American history, and they may not survive—as farmers, as exponents of the splendid rural civilization which has been the basis of our national life.
>
> America began as a Nation of farmers, desperately in debt. The Napoleonic wars sent prices skyward, and the resulting prosperity floated the new ship of state. When Napoleon was caged came the first great deflation. Prices of farm products dropped to half or a quarter what they had been. Other prices fell much less. Manufacturers got a tariff to help them; farmers got nothing; they went broke and went west by millions.
> The Civil War and the years following repeated the process with hardly a change, except that the postwar tariff was higher. The World War did the same, save that there is no longer a west for the farmer to go to.
>
> "Manufacturing has the tariff," said Doctor Dodd. "Transportation has the Esch-Cummins Act, and 5¾ per cent. Labor has restricted immigration—and I did all I could to help pass that immigration law. The farmer has nothing.
> "Secretary Mellon says that the country can not spare anything for farm relief—and in the same breath tells Congress to cut $225,000,000 from the income tax. Our good Democrats in Congress—I am a Democrat—say that they will cut $400,000,000 from the income tax; but where is relief for the farmer?"
>
> Doctor Dodd gave a concrete instance of how the farmer is exploited. He has a farm and an orchard in Virginia.
>
> Last year he sold his apples for 15 cents a barrel. He followed them to Washington, and found exactly similar apples selling at the rate of $15 a barrel.
>
> "What is the remedy?" asked Doctor Dodd. "I do not know; but I think one could be found. If I were a statesman responsible for the welfare of this country, I think I should find the remedy or commit suicide. I sometimes wonder if a good many of our public men want to find a remedy."
> Farmers or peasants? That is the choice. Will history show that this grim warning, delivered by one of the Nation's great students, in the very shadow of the Capitol, was given in vain?

If we approach our work in Congress this winter in that frame of mind in which leaders would have us, we can not hope to accomplish the changes which are so essential. We are, I fear, for the most part in a wrong frame of mind to do anything really constructive.

We need more than anything else at this time to face the facts as they are and resolve to keep them in mind in our consideration of the many pressing problems before us.

But from every hand, to keep us in this wrong frame of mind, comes the cry of prosperity. It is claimed that everything is in splendid order and there is no cause whatever for complaint from any source.

It has been suggested to me in correspondence which I have had with one of my farmer constituents in North Dakota that it might be a splendid idea at this time, in view of the fact that there are a great many people wanting to know just where this thing which is called prosperity is, to call the marines from Nicaragua and put them to the task of locating prosperity here at home.

I have before me a great many newspaper clippings which I have collected during the last two or three weeks. I merely wish to call to the attention of the Senate some of their headings. Here is one:

> Secretary Mellon declares business conditions stable.

And he goes on to show what a wonderfully prosperous year 1927 was and states that we may expect a continuation of that same state of affairs in 1928. "Speaker LONGWORTH," of the House, "finds prosperity in all quarters," according to another newspaper story.

During the Christmas season the Washington papers were filled with accounts of instances of unemployment and distress in the District of Columbia, here in the very shadow of the National Capitol, whence comes all of this boasting of our great national prosperity. We know that there were scores of individuals and of families right here in Washington needing aid, needing the help of charity, which was given so far as charity would permit; but yet it is claimed right here in Washington that we are living in an era of prosperity heretofore unknown to the Capital or to the Nation. Then came the cold spell during the Christmas holidays and with it came an announcement that—

> An army of nearly 700 homeless and unemployed men besieged the city's charitable refuges, and that various institutions housed and fed the largest group of unfortunates seen here since the winter of 1917.
> Reports from mission workers indicated that lodgings were being sought by shivering and hungry persons in virtually every section of the Capital.

And yet it is claimed we are in an era of the greatest prosperity the Nation has ever known.

In the Washington Times of January 2 one reads a like story. This clipping states:

From about noon yesterday, a portion of the army of unemployed began straggling into the Central Union Mission at 622 Louisiana Avenue NW. and the Gospel Mission at 214 John Marshall Place NW.

During the recent cold spell here the Gospel Mission used all its beds and other unfortunates slept upon the floor. Last year the Gospel Mission served 40,000 free meals for the hungry.

Again, I repeat, that occurred right here in the shadow of the Nation's Capitol and of the Treasury. How many more than the newspapers tell us are actually in dire need not only of food but of the other essentials of life no man can tell. I have before me a letter written to the New York World, and published in that newspaper under date of December 31 last, which indicates that perhaps there are thousands upon thousands of needy people yet maintaining a pride that denies them the freedom of calling upon the aid of charity. This gentleman writes:

If all the effort, money, and energy used to feed 50,000 hungry men in New York one day of the year were used to solve the problem of unemployment and fair wages, it would be a service rendered to the country a hundred times greater than all the charity organizations have ever accomplished. I have seen hundreds of young, strong, and honorable men walk the streets for three or four days without food, but they have not once accepted charity. These men have exhibited character and honor equal to the best. Charity seldom reaches this type.

And so it may be with thousands upon thousands in all sections of the United States to-day.

From the Baltimore Sun of December 23 comes the alarming information, at a time when prosperity is being preached to us, that an inquiry is to be made into unemployment. The total unemployment in the city of Baltimore at that time was placed at 75,000 and Henry F. Broening, president of the Baltimore Federation of Labor, asserted that the unemployment situation in Baltimore is worse than it was in 1921.

Many other newspaper clippings which are available show a similar condition to exist in other sections; but coming back to the city of Washington, we find the unemployment situation is regarded as wholly unsatisfactory. Yet it is said there is prosperity.

I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1927, the most prosperous year that this Nation has ever known, there were 135 failures of national banking institutions in the United States. In only one year during the last eight has there been a number of national bank failures exceeding that figure of 135.

According to Bradstreet's review of the 1927 situation, the security markets were enormous and speculation aided by easy bank credits swelled bank clearings and debits to new high levels, while the prices of stock and other exchange seats rose to levels taxing the imagination.

Business failures, according to Bradstreet's, last year were the second largest in history, and liabilities were the fourth largest on record in the history of this country.

Dun & Co. report failures in 1927 totaling 23,146, and claims of a larger number of failures than that have been made by others. However, the total which Dun & Co. report for 1927 were exceeded only by the totals of that terrible year 1922, and there was last year an increase in the sum total of liabilities.

Mr. President, I ask that this report by Dun & Co. may be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times, January 4, 1928]

FAILURES IN 1927 PLACED AT 23,146—DUN & CO. REPORT INCREASE OF 6 PER CENT IN YEAR—20,265 ON BRADSTREET'S RECORD—BIGGER TOTALS ONLY IN 1922—GREATER RISE IN SUM OF LIABILITIES—BANKRUPTCIES IN DECEMBER NUMBERED 2,162

The number of commercial failures in the United States has risen for the fourth consecutive year, R. G. Dun & Co. report for 1927, exclusive of banking and other fiduciary suspensions, the total being 23,146 for the year, against 21,773 defaults in 1926, 21,214 two years ago, 20,615 in 1924, and 18,718 insolvencies in 1923, the low point since 1920.

* * * * * * *

Liabilities fared much worse than the numerical exhibit, Dun's reports, reaching $520,104,268, and contrasting with $409,200,000 in 1926 and $443,700,000 in 1925, the increases over these two years being 27 and 18 per cent, respectively. The 1927 indebtedness, although large, falls below that for the four years immediately prior to 1925, and compares with a record high of $627,400,000 in 1921, in which year the returns reflected sharply the economic readjustment which began to gather force in 1920. The annual figures, as compiled by Dun & Co., follow:

Year	Number	Assets	Liabilities
1927	23,146	$256,739,633	$520,104,268
1926	21,773	202,345,485	409,232,278
1925	21,214	248,066,570	442,744,272
1924	20,615	337,945,190	543,225,449
1923	18,718	388,382,154	539,386,806
1922	23,676	413,357,995	623,896,251
1921	19,652	409,038,316	627,401,883
1920	8,881	195,504,114	295,121,805
1919	6,451	67,037,843	113,291,237
1918	9,892	101,637,798	163,019,979
1917	13,855	103,464,805	182,441,371
1916	16,993	113,599,026	196,212,256
1915	22,156	83,453,785	302,286,148
1914	18,280	265,293,046	357,908,859
1913	16,037	174,688,151	272,672,288
1912	15,452	126,278,321	203,117,391
1911	13,441	124,516,544	191,061,665

There was an increase in December, in accordance with a seasonal trend, failures for the month numbering 2,162, or about 16 per cent above the number for November and 21 per cent above that in October. Failures numbered 2,069 in December last year. Liabilities in December were $51,262,253, against $36,100,000 in November and $45,650,000 in December, 1926.

The total number of failures in the United States in 1927 reported to Bradstreet's was 20,265, and the total liabilities of those failing was $654,282,367, an increase of 1.2 per cent in the number of failures as compared with 1926, but a decrease in liabilities from that year of one-tenth of 1 per cent. The failures in 1927 constituted the second largest total on record, but fell below those of the peak year 1922 by 9.6 per cent, while the liabilities were the fourth largest recorded, falling 13.3 per cent behind those of the peak year 1921.

Following are the failures, assets, liabilities, and the percentage of those in business failing in each year of the last decade as reported by Bradstreet's:

Year	No failures	Actual assets, millions	Total liabilities, millions	Per cent failing
1927	20,265	385.1	654.3	0.80
1926	20,024	379.7	655.2	.88
1925	18,859	261.7	479.6	.84
1924	19,712	419.7	694.8	.89
1923	19,159	369.1	631.1	.89
1922	22,415	365.6	649.8	1.08
1921	20,014	446.6	755.7	.97
1920	8,463	274.1	426.3	.43
1919	5,515	55.3	115.5	.29
1918	9,331	69.3	137.9	.51

Mr. NYE. The Department of Justice records that during the last year there were 48,758 bankruptcies, involving $885,557,000, or $80,000,000 more than during 1926 and half a billion dollars more than 10 years ago.

We find that the condition of some of the more powerful banking institutions, located primarily in the city of New York, evidences an element of prosperity.

Under date of January 4, 1928, the New York Times declares that the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York enjoyed last year an increase of $1,077,739 in profits, which figure does not include, mind you, the $5,000,000 transferred to the surplus account during that year.

The Bowery and East River National Bank, of New York, showed undivided profits last year of $11,320,221 as against $6,574,545 the year previous.

The International Acceptance Bank transacted a greater volume of business in 1927 than in any previous year during its establishment; and, according to this story in the Times, after six years of operation it now reports total assets of $130,591,971, an increase of $24,969,891, or 23⅙ per cent since the close of 1926.

So I might go on further to show the increase in business transactions by the banks of the country during 1927.

Another newspaper, the Christian Science Monitor, in its issue of December 31, relates the high levels reached by financing in America in 1927, and here is a very interesting paragraph therefrom:

Bond financing, like total financing, for 1927 stands out as an all-time record, the figures in this class alone overtopping the total of stock and bond financing combined for 1926. The 1927 volume of bond financing was approximately $7,750,000,000. This is a 27 per cent increase over 1926 and a 47 per cent increase over the previous five-year average.

Indicating that whatever element of prosperity exists in any material order to-day is found only in those institutions which are dealing in the fluctuating values of stocks and bonds in this country.

According to the New York State Industrial Commission there were 643,000 men and women in the State of New York out of work last December, and 3,000,000 in the United States are declared to be out of work; and yet we call this an era of prosperity, boast of our prosperity, and every agency of the Government to-day is at work to sell this program of prosperity to the people of the country.

I have in my hand a copy of the Industrial, Agricultural, and General Employment Prospects for 1928, a bulletin issued by the United States Department of Labor. In the flyleaf of this document I find this very interesting explanation by Francis I. Jones, director general of the bureau.

Contrary—

He says—

to precedent established in former presidential election years, when the business world stood by waiting results before charting their programs, the opposite is true at this time. A careful perusal of this bulletin will disclose the important information that industry and business will mark new high levels in 1928.

The pessimists—

I want the Senate to hear this—

The pessimists, doubting Thomases, and the iconoclasts will be obliged to revise their opinions with respect to the Nation's industrial future.

And so one is scored who dares picture the real situation which prevails in this country to-day. The departments of the Government are giving over their literature to a condemnation of those who will not agree that in this day and age we are enjoying that measure of prosperity to which all people are entitled.

They say that business is prosperous in a general way. John Edgarton, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, addressing the annual convention of this association last October, used this language:

Outside the few gigantic corporations which do not have to bother about competition, and by whose large profits the public is misled, the common run of manufacturers in America to-day are in about as unhappy a condition as their fellow producers the farmers; and I challenge those who will overturn that statement.

That statement can not be overturned. Statistics disclose that Mr. Edgarton knew of what he was talking.

According to the income-tax returns, 40 per cent, or 200,000 of the manufacturing corporations of this country, lost money in the last reported year. Forty per cent of all corporations doing business in this country lost money! Is that prosperity? The corporations number 430,072. Of that number, one-twentieth of 1 per cent gathered in 40 per cent of the total profits of all corporations for that one year.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NYE. I do.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator believe that the unfortunate condition of 40 per cent of these corporations is due to the fact that tariff rates are too high?

Mr. NYE. I would not put it in just that language; but I do believe that their continued adversity is attributable to the fact that we have a tariff law which in words declares itself to be in the interest of agriculture, which contains schedules in the interest of agriculture, but which the Congress of the United States declines to give the farmers the advantage of through failure to enact that legislation which will make effective the tariff which has been written in support of agriculture.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand; but the Senator has no knowledge that the unfortunate condition of these corporations is due to the fact that the present tariff rates are too high.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. I should like to propound a question to the junior Senator from North Dakota. Is it not a fact that the large percentage of those corporations which are in a serious condition at the present time are operating throughout the agricultural West?

Mr. NYE. I think that is entirely true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a matter of fact, the corporations that find themselves in distress as a rule are the smaller corporations, manufacturers, and so forth, are they not?

Mr. NYE. That is true.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is quite possible that an explanation can be found in the statement made by Roger Babson at Omaha, I think, on the 25th day of May, in which he said we were evidently entering upon an epoch in which the big fellow is eating the little fellow. The little, independent manufacturer or merchant is "on the skids." He is being eaten up by the big fellow. I think that will explain it to some extent. I think that is true; but what I have never been able to understand is that the little fellow seems to like it.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator for that explanation.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, does the Senator remember what Mr. Babson said with regard to the pending proposal for agricultural relief? Does the Senator remember Mr. Babson's suggestion as to what should be done by the Congress to aid the farmer?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, yes; I remember it very well. I will state it if the Senator will permit me. He advised the farmers of the Northwest to go to Washington and camp on the coat tails of Congress.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think he was wrong. I think he should have said they should go to Washington and camp on the coat tails of the President.

Mr. McLEAN. But not to secure a reduction of the tariff, if I remember correctly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not remember that statement.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. I think Mr. Babson also stated that he would advise the young men in the West to get out unless conditions improved. I am speaking about the young men on the farms.

Mr. McLEAN. That is not germane to the question which I propounded.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, did he tell them where to go?

Mr. HOWELL. To get into big business.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In California?

Mr. HOWELL. I assume so. There is a good deal of big business in California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There is, indeed—fine business.

Mr. HOWELL. And it can accommodate them.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. A long time ago we had a great many people who went from Iowa to California. We have not anybody in Iowa now who has money enough to go to California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The most progressive, the most intelligent, and, if I may say it, the most splendid of your people have come to California, and they are all prosperous there. I know that Iowa, my native State, needs relief. I will hereafter point out the kind of relief I think she needs.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, one-fourth of 1 per cent of all corporations doing business in America in this one year took 66 per cent of the profits of all corporations. The net profits of all corporations in that one year were $7,500,000,000. Sixty-six per cent of this, remember, went to one-fourth of 1 per cent of all corporations, or to 1,000 corporations. One thousand corporations, then, were the recipients of $5,000,000,000 of the $7,500,000,000 of profits enjoyed by all of the corporations doing business in America in that one year; and it is interesting at this point to note this comparison:

Here are 1,000 big corporations in America enjoying an annual profit of approximately $5,000,000,000, while the entire revenue, not profit, of the one-third of our population engaged in agriculture does not total quite twice the profits of that mere handful of corporations.

We know of the 10 per cent wage reduction in the textile industry. We know of the unwholesome condition existing in the mining industry. We know of the tremendous increase in criminal proceedings before the courts of our country. We know of the increase in bankruptcies and foreclosures. Yet, Mr. President, in spite of all of these facts, we still are persuaded to believe that we ought to march right in line with those whose banner reads, "The most prosperous era in all American history." We know of the orgy which has taken place upon the stock and bonds market; and, if that spells prosperity, then, of course, I must agree with those who contend to-day that this is a wonderful era of prosperity.

No! Business, little business, the smaller business corporations in this country, do not know where to find that thing called prosperity. Likewise, the American farmer is pretty hard pressed to find it possible to say that his condition is satisfactory; that he is satisfied to leave things just as they are; that he is asking no changes here, there, or anywhere; that he is going to work his own way out of this difficulty all right. The fact of the matter is that the farmer finds himself to-day in a position where it is questionable in his mind whether he is going to be found following his industry in that particular quarter to-morrow.

According again to Federal census figures, 29.9 per cent of the people of the United States are living upon and are dependent upon the farms; and yet that virtually 30 per cent are enjoying only 8 per cent of the current national income. In the last six years the American farmers have lost in capital stock $20,000,000,000. The exchange value of their farm lands has decreased $4,000,000,000. Farm indebtedness in the last 15 years has increased from four to twelve billions of dollars; and for the products for which the farmer in 1925 received $10,000,000,000 the American consumer paid $30,000,000,000, or three times what the farmer received.

It is true that farm prices have increased during this period following the war. It is all very true. They have increased 26 per cent; but the increase in farm-living costs has not stopped at 26 per cent, but has gone on to 68 per cent.

Likewise in the case of taxes: Farm taxes have increased 112 per cent. Farm-building costs have increased 102 per cent. The freight rates on grain have virtually doubled since the war. Where it cost on the average $45 prior to the war to ship a carload of hogs to market, to-day it costs $130.

Then, following still further in the Federal census figures, we find there was an increase since 1914 of only 10,000 farms operated in the United States; yet of the total of farms operated in the United States in 1925 there were 80,000 less farm owners than there were in 1914, and there were 100,000 more tenants operating the farm lands of the United States than in 1914.

It is very interesting, too, to note that while in 1925 there was more livestock in the country than in 1914, its value was less by considerable than the value placed upon the lesser amount in 1914; and the value of livestock in 1925 was only half what it was in 1920.

I want to call to the attention of the Senate the situation in my own State; and what I say of the situation there I think is equally true of the situation prevailing in every other great agricultural State to-day.

We have there a situation which discloses that an increase of 50 cents in the price of a bushel of wheat would mean to every family in the State of North Dakota an increase of $500 with which to carry on their lives, and yet North Dakota is not dependent upon wheat alone, for the value of our dairy products is thirteen times greater than is the value of our wheat crop.

While the contributions of North Dakota may be small in comparison with those of other States, nevertheless some of its contributions are a matter which the people of this country must recognize, for we are producing there one-third of all the flax produced in the United States, two-fifths of all the spring wheat, and one-fifth of all the wheat produced in the United States. No State is producing more rye and more barley than we are in North Dakota; only seven States produce more potatoes; and yet in North Dakota there exists at this time a situation which makes it impossible for anyone to stand up and declare that this is a prosperous era and get away with it.

A few weeks ago I had occasion to discuss our agricultural problem before an audience in New York, and through a very unfair representation given to that interview and address in New York, some of the people in my State have felt constrained to declare that I was grossly misrepresenting the State of North Dakota. From one newspaper, the Grand Forks Herald, comes an editorial clipping under the title "Libeling North Dakota." I shall read at this time the first paragraph:

> In a recent address in New York Senator NYE, of North Dakota, told his audience that the farmers of North Dakota are worse off than they were four or five years ago, that tenant farming in the State is increasing at an alarming rate, and that six banks out of eight in one county had gone into receivership in three days.

In the main, that is what I did say. I did not say that the condition was worse than it was at any time before the war, but I did say that I did not believe there was any material improvement over the situation which prevailed in 1920 and 1921. But there is an element of pride, of course, in every State, and anyone who ventures to say that things in his State are not as they ought to be, and who tells the trueness of the situation which does prevail there, is subject to a charge of disloyalty to his State in certain minds. For my own part, however, I can not see how agriculture is ever going to be restored to that balance to which it is entitled until the people of this country are awakened to the real situation which does prevail, and they are not going to be awakened to that situation so long as we, as representatives of those people first concerned, sit back and swallow without a gulp, even, these stories, and admit that we are living in an age of wonderful prosperity.

The tenor of the people who object toward those who go out and tell the truth about conditions is indicated in a further paragraph in this same editorial:

> Mr. NYE has grossly misrepresented North Dakota in this address, and the misrepresentation is none the less because of the possible accuracy of the figures which he quotes, and none the less injurious on that account.

In other words, I may be telling the truth, but am telling things that should not be told, and ought to keep quiet in order that we may get some more people into North Dakota, put them out on these vast areas of the State which have been vacated during these last few years—help those who have been overburdened with land through foreclosures and through forfeitures which have been made during this period of depression—get them on to that land, and with what happens to them after that we are not concerned. But let us unload this land.

Mr. President, I think we ought to start on a firmer foundation. I think we ought to start out and establish agriculture in such a fashion that it will offer to that man who will properly and fairly exercise himself toward the labor which a farm calls for at least a small chance of making his effort count for something. Until that time I think it a terrible mistake on the part of any individual to seek to plant in the minds of any people the thought that things are wonderfully improved in agricultural America and that the opportunity is ripe now for people who want to go to farming to undertake it at this particular time.

These editorials which have been published along that line have brought to me a great lot of correspondence from people who are differing with the editorial criticism which is offered. Just one letter do I want to read indicating the general tenor of the thought of the people:

> Mr. NYE: I am inclosing an editorial taken from the Minto Journal which bears reference to your speech in New York. I for one agree with you, as I have come in contact with a larger number of farmers than Mr. Mitchell, who is responsible for this editorial, and I am here to tell you that the majority of farmers claim that farming has been a losing proposition for the last number of years.
> Mr. Mitchell does not remember that almost every town in this county has had a bank failure this fall—

Let me remark here, Senators, that in that county they had a fair crop this year; and yet, in spite of it, these bank failures continue. I read further from the letter:

> We have had four bank failures within a radius of 18 miles within the last month. If the editor will only stop a few moments to review the cause of this, I am sure he will find that the farmers and farming have contributed a great deal to the financial downfall of these institutions. I presume Mr. Mitchell would like for you to paint an illusive picture before an eastern audience depicting the State of North Dakota as a great cornucopia, while in reality it should almost be assigned to the rôle of a sick man, as I figure its basic industry (agriculture) is a sickening proposition and has almost sapped the morals of those engaged in it. The elements which the farmer has to contend with are high prices of machinery, high cost of labor, high transportation charges, while in turn he receives a low price for his grain, and the purchasing power of his dollar is low enough.

I contend, Mr. President, that no agricultural State in this Union will come back more quickly, will get on its feet more quickly, than will North Dakota if agriculture is given half a chance to make its efforts count for some reasonable return.

The claim has been made during this debate, and made repeatedly—at least it has been insinuated—that the enhanced land values during the war brought about a condition which we have to expect and must accept as being the only thing that naturally could follow now. It is said that if values went up during the war that they have to come down eventually, and now is the time that they must come down. But, Mr. President, in my own State of North Dakota land values were not enhanced during the war period by one single, solitary penny.

They were not inflated out there as they were in some other States.

I merely recite this to indicate that there were States where there was no land boom during the war, but where the situation prevailing to-day is virtually as serious as it is in those States where land values did mount to proportions that virtually were out of sight.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. What was the reason why land values did not rise in your State?

Mr. NYE. I am delighted to explain that to the Senator. I think one man was more responsible than any other, as the story is told, for the good fortune that was visited upon North Dakota during the war period, that found our land values not enhanced. That one individual is none other than my colleague, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. During that war period North Dakota was the one State in the Union which was really not a part of the Union. We were a lot of bolsheviks out there, so they said. We were trying to solve our problems within the State. We were establishing State industries that were going to take care of the products we were producing in abundance, and give the producer a greater proportion of that margin which existed between his return and the price paid by the consumer.

In opposition to this program there came every powerful industry and every powerful influence in this country, to the end that credit was injured to such an extent, in so far as North Dakota was concerned, that we could not float, we could not sell, through the ordinary channels in this country, the bonds which were offered by the State of North Dakota to establish those industries.

A false impression went out as to our purpose, of the purpose of these honest and hard-working and seriously engaged people of North Dakota. The impression went out that those farmers were a dangerous lot of people, that North Dakota's credit was being wrecked, that it would be unsafe to make any investments in lands in North Dakota. The result was that we went through that period without any enhanced land values, and I think no one is more to be thanked for that than the Nonpartisan League, which was so severely criticized at that time, and to some degree criticized since.

Mr. McLEAN. Your wheat acreage was increased considerably out there, was it not?

Mr. NYE. Our wheat acreage was increased, and I am going to touch upon that a little later on.

The Minneapolis Journal, in connection with this objection to my disclosing the truths which exist in agricultural America, asks me this question publicly:

> In the light of these figures, Senator, did you do the fair thing toward North Dakota when you let your hearers go away with the impression that things were going from bad to worse on farms that have just produced the second most valuable crop in all their history?

There is the situation, Mr. President. They have produced their second most valuable crop in North Dakota in all history, and yet, in spite of this, there are continued bank failures, there are continued bankruptcies, there are continued foreclosures and forfeitures of lands, because under the existing order the farmer is not receiving for that which he is producing a return which will compensate him for the labor and for the costs involved in the producing of that thing. It amounts virtually to this: That the more a farmer produces to-day, the worse off he is.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. I was not in the Chamber during the early part of the Senator's speech and it was not my pleasure to hear that part of it. I wondered whether the Senator went into the causes of the depreciation of the farmer's dollar; and if so, what his views are on that point.

Mr. NYE. I have not yet done so, but I fully plan to.

In my own State of North Dakota see what has occurred since the war. There were less farms in 1925, according to the Federal census, than there were in 1910. Where in 1910, 17 years ago, with our resources hardly scratched, with the whole future before us, we had 44,000 farm owners in the State of North Dakota, 15 years later found us not with 44,000 full farm owners, but with only 26,000 farm owners. Where 1910 found us with only 10,000 tenants, 1925 found us with 26,000 tenants, or as many tenants as we had full farm owners in 1925.

The value of farm property in North Dakota was decreased by half a billion, decreased from one and a half billion dollars to practically a billion dollars, since 1920. There was more livestock in North Dakota in 1925 than there was in 1910, and a much better grade of livestock. Yet it is found to be, according to the Federal enumeration, worth less money than was that lesser amount in 1910.

The worth of all farm lands and buildings in North Dakota in 1925 was fixed by the Federal census at $200,000,000. That means the values held by so-called farm owners in North Dakota. But to what extent are they really farm owners? Against this valuation of $200,000,000 there exists to-day a mortgage debt of $82,000,000, or that was what existed in 1925. I know the odds are greater to-day. In other words, 41 per cent of the values held by so-called full farm owners in 1925 in that one agricultural State are mortgaged. Yet we call them full farm owners, according to the Federal census.

What is the cause of this difficulty confronting agriculture to-day? I do not think I will go to any length in discussing that or to do more than repeat what I have already said. The American farmer can go on from now until doomsday producing as he has never produced before, making two blades grow where one grew before, increasing his production on every hand; but, Mr. President, no matter to what ends he goes in that effort, he is going to find himself still on the small end when it comes to balancing up accounts, because so long as men produce and must sell that which they produce for less than the cost of production, there can not be any end other than the eventual decay of that industry which those individuals are following, and unless there can be favors alike upon all the people, where there are favors to be bestowed by the Government, we sound indeed the danger signal.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am very much interested in the address of the Senator. I would be very glad to have him tell us whom he includes under the term "farmer." I do not put the question idly, or to engage in a quibble over words, but I want to know whom he includes under the term "farmer" when he speaks of the farmers of a given State.

Mr. NYE. Of a given State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; within the State of North Dakota, or the State of Minnesota or Montana or California or Florida. What is the figure?

Mr. NYE. I labor under the assumption that from a Federal standpoint anyone can be considered a farmer whom the Federal census has considered to be among the 29.9 per cent of the people who are resident upon the agricultural lands of the country.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does that include stock raising and dairying in all its branches?

Mr. NYE. Yes, indeed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It would not include mining?

Mr. NYE. No; not mining.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Men engaged in getting something out of the soil of the earth?

Mr. NYE. Tilling the soil, producing from the soil that which the people must have.

What is it that happened to agriculture? A few days ago the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]—I wish he were in the Chamber now—yes; I see he is in the Chamber—remarked on the floor of the Senate, and he spoke, I think, honest convictions that the whole difficulty confronting agriculture to-day is that occasioned by the fact of inflation during the war, that farm land values had been inflated during the war period and that the farmer had to expect eventually to come down off of that high plane. I think the Senator was thoroughly honest in his assumption that that was the truth of the situation. I think from what I have said here this afternoon that I have disclosed that in the case of at least one State inflated land values contributed nothing to the cause, because there were no inflated land values.

What really happened was this, Mr. President: The war came on, and the Government, this Government, this Congress, the administration at that time, urged the farmer to devote himself to the task of producing more food. He could not produce too much of it; he was assured of that. Then, though he was minus the ordinary help that he had upon his farm, though his sons had been drafted in the service and carried across the seas to conduct the war, he reached out and during that period of high labor prices engaged expensive help. He bought additional expensive, high-priced machinery, machinery which had gone up in price during that period. He did all of that during that period. He bought it because his country urged him to do it. During the period of the war, with all credit to the boys who carried the real brunt of that service, do not overlook the fact that one who contributed very materially to our success in the war was none other than the farmer of America. Not only did he sustain and back up his own

Army, his own boys, but he backed up and sustained virtually every army that was engaged in that war on the side of the Allies.

The farmer engaged during that war in a most desperate undertaking. He left no stone unturned to respond to the appeal by his Government to produce more food. Then came the end of the war, and with the end of the war came a warning within the farmer: "Here, we have had these big years, and we can not expect them to continue. Now, with the war over, we will have to slow up. We had better do some liquidating. We had better get back to normalcy as all people must following a war." But with that warning in his mind the Government of the United States, through its spokesmen, advised the farmer that for years and years to come he was going to have to feed the world; that he could keep right on producing; that he must in all fairness keep right on producing as he had been producing during the war.

With that assurance, and in spite of the limitations which were placed upon him and the comparatively low prices he had had for his products during the war—in spite of all that he continued to respond to that appeal by his Government to produce and continue to produce more food. He carried on to a certain point. What was that point?

He found himself one afternoon going along splendidly. He found himself on the next morning virtually, if not completely, out of the economic picture altogether. What had happened was that here in Washington there gathered a mere handful of men determined that the most essential thing concerning America at that time was the thing of driving America back to normalcy, and that the way to do it was to reduce credit. The way to do it was to withdraw the vast amount of credit which had been extended by the Federal reserve system during that period. So, Mr. Banker, out on the plains and out on the prairies and out in agricultural America generally, had nothing other to do to redeem himself for the easy credit of which he availed himself during the war than to turn to those to whom he had loaned money during the war period. He went to the farmer and explained that the demand was made upon him for repayment of the credit which had been extended during the war. The farmer said, "I suppose I have got to respond, then." So he liquidated as best he could. He had not enough to clean up his indebtedness contracted while he was responding to the prayers of his Government for help during the war time. And so—but some things are perhaps better unsaid, and I think I shall leave that unsaid.

In any event the farmer went back home, took whatever crop was available, and hauled it into market, took it there with the hope and in the expectation that with the return from that crop he could liquidate the greater portion of his debt. He got into a market that had lost its bottom, because that deflation movement had virtually ended the market and killed it, since every farmer in America was dumping his produce upon the market at that time in order that he might liquidate. After all was said and done, after the farmer had moved all his stuff and all his products into the market, he was still way short of being able to liquidate his indebtedness. Then went the equities in the land which he had bought during the war to help his Uncle Sam. Away went the equities in the land. In many cases, in hundreds upon hundreds of cases, there went at the same time the homestead which for 30 and 40 years had been without incumbrance and which, through the sweat of the man and his wife and his children, had been counted by them at one time as their home. But the home went as the result of that deflation program of 1920 and 1921. But that was not the end of it. During that period there was written by all odds the blackest page in all American history.

During the period of the war, when the farmer and all others were doing their utmost to prosecute the war, the urge came to help to finance the war. Few were the farmers who did not respond to the appeal which was made by the Government and by the bankers to buy until it hurt of Liberty loan bonds. Credit was made so easy that the bankers could say, "Here, you do not need to worry about the price of these. Just give us your note for the bond and you can clean it up after a while. That bond you must feel and can always know is as good as gold in your possession any day. You never need worry about that. You can always liquidate a bond indebtedness of that kind. It never need give you any worry."

But in that deflation program, when the stock of the farmer and the grain and the extra land bought during the war and the homestead were not enough to liquidate, then Mr. Farmer went into the bank and into the safe-deposit vault and took out the bonds which he had bought during the war, which he had more often than not borrowed money to possess, and took it to the cashier's window and said, "Here, apply these on my indebtedness" Mr. Banker during that period said to him, "I am awfully sorry, but I suppose you are well aware of the fact that we can not give you 100 cents on the dollar for this bond." "What? A Government bond, a Liberty loan bond, and I can not have what I paid for it, to say nothing about the interest?" "No; I am sorry, but the market for Liberty bonds is only 75 or 80 or 85 cents."

My friends, that was by all odds the blackest page ever written in all American history, and yet to-day, while the Government of the United States is responsible for the hole in which the farmer finds himself, this same Government declines to give to him that measure of aid which he needs to save himself from further decay. When he asks that a life buoy be thrown out to him, the Congress of the United States or the administration offers instead to throw him an anchor, and that has been the situation for the last four or five years. I insist that if we are to continue to deny to the agricultural people of America that measure of help to which they are entitled, that measure of help which they must have if they are to be saved, if we longer deny that to them we are going to pay the penalty as a nation. The Nation will not pay the penalty prior to the penalty which political parties must pay for longer ignoring the situation.

Upon this particular day, and though I am not affiliated with that party which honors his day, Jackson Day, I want to read to the Senate a quotation attributed to Andrew Jackson:

> It is to be regretted that the rich and powerful too often bend the acts of government to their selfish purposes. Distinctions in society will always exist under every just government. Equality of talents, of education, or of wealth can not be produced by human institutions. In the full enjoyment of the gifts of heaven and the fruits of superior industry, economy, and virtue, every man is equally entitled to protection by law, but when the laws undertake to add to these natural and just advantages artificial distinctions, to grant title, gratuities, and exclusive privileges, to make the rich richer and the potent more powerful, the humble members of society—the farmers, mechanics, and laborers—who have neither the time nor the means of securing like favors to themselves, have a right to complain of the injustice of their Government. There are no necessary evils in government. Its evils exist only in its abuses. If it would confine itself to equal protection, and, as heaven does its rains, shower its favors alike on the high and the low, the rich and the poor, it would be an unqualified blessing.

To that might be added the suggestion that if the Government would confine itself to equal protection and, as heaven does its rains, shower its favors alike on the high and low, the rich and the poor, the East and the West, the North and the South, it would be an unqualified blessing. But instead of seeking to give such a fair distribution of favors of the Government here in this country, we continue to ignore the fact that the blessings are all against certain endeavors in the country and all in favor of a very few. In spite of the situation which confronts the country to-day in the matter of unemployment in the great industry of agriculture and the smaller manufacturing and business industries, we are being preached to day after day that this is the most wonderful era of prosperity any nation has ever enjoyed.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I am very much interested in President Jackson's pronunciamento, especially with regard to the portion which says that heaven showers its rains equally upon all alike. Is that quite true?

Mr. NYE. I expect that literally it is not.

Mr. McLEAN. Has not the Senator had experiences in North Dakota of a good many——

Mr. NYE. Not the experiences which are generally believed to be true. Some sections of our State do not have as great proportion of rain as others.

Mr. McLEAN. While it falls equally on the just and unjust, it does not fall equally on different portions of the United States, and because of that, and I think possibly other causes, my information is that the Dakota lands do not produce as large an average number of bushels per acre of wheat as some other sections of the country.

Mr. NYE. I think there is no section in the United States that produces a greater abundance per acre of hard wheat than does my State of North Dakota.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator ought to know, but my information is that during the war the acreage of wheat in North Dakota was greatly extended.

Mr. NYE. It was.

Mr. McLEAN. And that in many portions of the State the production was less than 10 bushels to the acre.

Mr. NYE. I will say to the Senator that it is true that during the period of the World War we were most unfortunate in North Dakota, striving as the farmers were to respond to the appeal for more foodstuffs. There was a great spread out of farming endeavor, much greater acreage was put in, and the price that was made available at that time was a thing which all were seeking, of course; and yet during that particular period we were most unfortunate in our weather conditions in North Dakota.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; that is the point I want to bring out. But the Senator would not hold Congress responsible for that?

Mr. NYE. But, Mr. President, what was true in North Dakota in that respect was not true in the other States which are complaining more bitterly, possibly, than North Dakota complains to-day about conditions. Iowa came through consistently with crops during that period, and portions of my own State came through consistently with good crops.

Mr. McLEAN. The point I want to bring out, I will say to the Senator, is the fact that President Jackson was wrong in his declaration that all sections of the country are favored with sufficient rainfall; and, that being so, Congress ought to come to the front and equal, if not exceed, Providence in extending assistance.

Mr. NYE. Virtually all sections of the country get at least a sprinkle once in a while, and in so far as the Government is concerned if it would just let a little sprinkle filter out to the masses of the people of this country there might be some reason to offer thanks.

Mr. McLEAN. We have as yet discovered no way by which we can add to the rainfall of the country.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I assume that the principal rainfall in the State of Connecticut comes from the tariff system.

Mr. McLEAN. What I should like to know is just what effect the tariff has in its influence upon the deplorable condition from which the farmers insist they are now suffering. I am not saying this in a spirit of criticism at all; I know that environment has a great deal to do with political conviction. I am willing to confess it so far as I am concerned. We have here to-day at least three separate and distinct schools on the tariff question. I think it is important to ascertain who is right, if possible, and what effect the tariff has on the conditions in the agricultural sections.

Up to date there has not been indicated, so far as my observation goes, a single fact that would satisfy an impartial tribunal that any of the tariff rates are too high; that is, that they exceed the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

Mr. NYE. Yes; but we do find a very determined presentation here of the claim that, while there may not come from certain sources a demand for lowering of tariff schedules, there has been, and has been for a number of years, a repeated demand made for making effective those schedules which have been written into the tariff law but which are not effective to-day for the farmer.

Mr. McLEAN. To just what schedules now does the Senator refer?

Mr. NYE. Take the wheat schedule; take the splendid protection afforded wheat through the tariff; it does not mean a penny to the wheat producer in the United States. In my State of North Dakota, on the border of the Canadian line, there would be the opportunity, if there were not trade restrictions or barriers of any kind, for the North Dakota farmer living in the United States of America to take his load of wheat into Canada and get more money for it than he can obtain in the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. Admitting all that, how will it help the wheat producer to reduce the tariff duties on industrial products to a degree that will permit an influx of foreign goods? That is the point.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I assume that the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] all have a bearing upon this particular resolution. Now, I wish to ask the Senator this question: If, in his judgment, there were excessive schedules in the present tariff system would he vote to reduce those schedules?

Mr. McLEAN. No; not at this session.

Mr. McMASTER. But would he vote to reduce them?

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, I would do so when the tariff should be revised.

Mr. McMASTER. In other words, then, the Senator from Connecticut agrees with this resolution——

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no.

Mr. McMASTER. That if there are excessive schedules they should be reduced, and he would vote to reduce them. That is the fundamental part of the resolution. The only difference between the Senator from Connecticut and those who are supporting the resolution is that he does not want to interfere with the interests of political parties at this time, but that later on he is willing to reduce the tariff schedules.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator, at least, ought to make out a prima facie case that there is one schedule that is excessive before he calls upon the Congress of the United States to reduce the tariff. We all know what tariff revision means. I do not now wish to discuss the tariff question, but I have been through two tariff revisions, and I know what tariff revision means. In the last revision we had some 40 experts who labored diligently for more than four months to try to ascertain the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and I want to say to the Senator that in no single instance did the Committee on Finance approve a rate in excess of the evidence which was produced before the committee indicating the difference between the cost of producing the article at home and abroad.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what evidence was presented to the Committee on Finance of the Senate to justify the committee in establishing the schedules upon aluminum products? I have gone carefully through the testimony of the Finance Committee, and I fail to find there any evidence that was presented to that committee, at least in open session, that would justify the rates which were accorded to aluminum products.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if this colloquy is going to be prolonged, I should like within two or three minutes to close what I have to say.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator from North Dakota is right about that; I think he is entitled to finish his address. I am very glad, however, that the Senator from South Dakota brought up the question of aluminum.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator from Connecticut wishes briefly to answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota, I would certainly let him incorporate his answer right now in my remarks.

Mr. McLEAN. I prefer to do it later; but I will say that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] yesterday called attention to the tariff rates on aluminum, and I think he made an estimate as a climax to his speech that on an article costing something like $4.50 which his wife had purchased the tariff tax was considerably more than $2. I want to say now that I think it is to be regretted that a United States Senator when he discusses a subject of this importance should not take the trouble to attempt at least to secure information that will enable him to discuss it without advertising the fact that he is absolutely ignorant of the subject. I will undertake in my own time to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the tax estimated by the Senator from New York is more than double the amount that the facts will warrant.

Mr. NYE. Very well, Mr. President. As I said at the outset, I did not wish to undertake at this time to argue with those who contend that the resolution before us is not choice at this particular time, but I wanted only to say that it sounded and expressed the attitude of a great mass of our population in America to-day who, seeing, day after day and year after year, a great flow of prosperity into a few individual corners to a few powerful corporations, while they themselves are left without a chance, seemingly, to make their best efforts win them a reasonably fair return for their endeavor, are not going to stop to quibble about any little niceties and about the fine words that may be said in support of certain schedules in the tariff law, but they are going to seek that means of elevating themselves to the higher plane which protected industry enjoys. They are going to be quite blind to anything else, I might say to the Senator, and are going to be determined, as a last resort, to tear down the props that will bring all industry down to a plane which is occupied to-day, I think I am safe in saying, by a majority of the people of the United States.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, has the Senator ever given consideration to what the effect of that program would be upon the 40 per cent of the Dakota farmers whose farms are mortgaged?

Mr. NYE. I have. Mr. President, I do not think, come what may, that the farmers of North Dakota or of any other agricultural State in the Union can be deflated or injured any more than they are injured right now. For the most part, the farmer retains so small an equity in comparison to the whole value of his property that he is really not seriously concerned, unless he can be given a chance to come back. I can see dangers along the path of a program which might find us destroying the structure which has been erected in this country, but I believe that any amending of the tariff that is undertaken must be undertaken gradually; must be accomplished very slowly and cautiously. However, I am speaking now for people who are not much concerned about anything but their own condition.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, that reminds me of the days in the eighties when the farmers were just as certain that greenbacks would remedy their troubles as they are certain now that a cut in the tariff will remedy their troubles. Then in the nineties they were just as certain that the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was the specific for their disease. But saner counsels prevailed. I do not quite believe the Senator from North Dakota wants to engage in an endeavor that will bring disaster to all the American people. He must know that when prices are cut in two the debts of the debtor class are doubled; the national debt is doubled, and the mortgage of every Dakota farmer is doubled. Those mortgages are not reduced; interest on those mortgages is not reduced; but it would take 2 bushels of wheat to raise the same amount of money that 1 bushel of wheat would raise before; and if we should double the production of wheat in this country I am afraid the Senator would have some difficulty in stabilizing the price, even if Congress were unanimous in its sympathy with him.

Mr. NYE. Very well; but the Senator will agree, then, that if these dire things are in store for us, if there is to be undertaken a program which will bring that about, we had better devote ourselves to satisfying the demand which does exist to-day for making effective the tariff upon all people alike.

Mr. McLEAN. O Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. If there is a tariff schedule which is not operative as to the great mass of the people of this country it had better be made effective.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator must realize that the spread between the retail price of an article and the price which the manufacturer receives is so wide that the tariff has little to do with the cost or the price to the consumer, and he himself must realize that he is on the wrong track entirely when he thinks that the reduction of tariff rates below a reasonable protection will benefit the farmer. The price of wheat can not be pulled down faster than by reducing the purchasing power of the men and women who eat wheat.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr McMASTER. All of the opponents of this resolution assume that the rates are to be cut so low that industry is to be injured, that labor is to be thrown out of employment. That is not the proposition back of this resolution. The resolution starts out with an assumption of fact that there are certain excessive schedules, and if the excessive schedules shall be reduced it will increase the purchasing power of the masses. If it is true that there are excessive schedules, and those excessive schedules shall be reduced, will that not increase the purchasing power of the farmer?

Mr. McLEAN. But before we engage in this dangerous operation, let us ascertain the facts.

Mr. McMASTER. The only way to ascertain the facts is to pass the resolution, start the tariff revision, and have your investigation.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, we already have a law by which——

Mr. McMASTER. No; if we wait for tariff revision to find out any of those things it will be a thousand years before we can have tariff revision.

Mr. McLEAN. The law to-day provides that the tariff on any one of these articles can be cut 50 per cent provided you can satisfy the Tariff Commission that the cut is legitimate—that is, that the existing tariff exceeds the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. Is there any evidence here that one single effort has been made, one single appeal has been brought to that commission to ascertain whether or not a rate is excessive?

All the law you need under any circumstances you have. You say it will not operate. You do not know whether it will or not, because you have not tried. Certainly you ought to be willing to trust the instrumentalities of this Government to a sufficient extent to attempt to apply a law that will give you absolute relief if it is justified.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, we may get relief from the Tariff Commission and we may not get relief from the Tariff Commission. I have not any too much confidence in that kind of relief; but when I take the hearings of a committee of which the distinguished Senator from Connecticut was a member and search through the records of those hearings to obtain evidence that warranted the committee in writing certain schedules into this tariff act, and I find that the evidence is not there in open hearings, it would rather lead one to believe that possibly the leaders of the industries came to certain members of the committee and said, "This is what we want"; and they certainly got what they wanted; but they did not present the evidence in the open hearings before that committee.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to finish my remarks, this discussion between the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Connecticut can proceed in their own time.

Mr. McLEAN. I hope the Senator will just let me reply.

Mr. NYE. Will it be brief, Mr. President?

Mr. McLEAN. Very brief.

Mr. NYE. And not invite any further debate at this time?

Mr. McLEAN. Very brief, I assure the Senator.

Mr. NYE. Very well.

Mr. McLEAN. I do remember, and remember distinctly, that when we adjusted the schedule which related to agricultural products we did not make any very definite investigation. We took the word of the Senators who at that time represented the agricultural bloc; and it is my definite recollection that in every single instance we gave to the representative of the agricultural bloc the rate that he requested. I myself had something to do with the rate on cheese, because I was told by a Senator from the Northwest that he thought the rate on cheese ought to be so and so, and it was adjusted to suit him. The rate on butter may have been a trifle low, but it has been increased since by the President.

Why lose faith until you have tried? You would be in a much stronger position here to-day, gentlemen, if you could show that in the case of these rates that you suspect are excessive you had gone to the Tariff Commission and requested a reduction. If you think that anything was done by the Committee on Finance that should not have been done, that anything was done behind closed doors that should have been done with doors open, take your case to that commission. If they turn you down, then come to Congress and give us the reasons for a change.

Mr. McMASTER. Just one moment, Mr. President, and then I shall be through.

In regard to agricultural products, the distinguished Senator says that not much testimony was taken.

Mr. McLEAN. We gave the farmers all they wanted.

Mr. McMASTER. The representatives of every farm organization in America appeared before that committee. Your report upon agricultural commodities is comprehensive as to the tariff schedules that they wanted. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut was a member of the committee. The producers of 14,000,000,000 pounds of milk went before the committee and asked for a schedule of 3½ cents a gallon, and your committee gave them 2½ cents. They asked for a duty of 10 cents a pound on butter, and you gave them 8 cents. They asked as high as 10 cents a dozen on eggs, and you gave them 8 cents. They asked for a higher duty on rice, and you cut that down. They asked for a higher duty on peanuts, and you cut that down. They asked for a duty upon hides, and you gave them a small duty upon hides, but that was knocked out here in the Senate. As a matter of fact, the Finance Committee cut down nearly every schedule that the agriculturists of America asked for. Far different, indeed, was the treatment accorded the industrialists.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I can not yield any further. I promise the Senator that within a very few minutes he can have the floor and take all the time that may be required.

Mr. McLEAN. I simply wish to say that the Senator from South Dakota is entirely mistaken.

Mr. NYE. I have set out this afternoon to express the wish of the agricultural people of the United States to be given an equal balance of favor in so far as favors of Government are concerned, and so far as those figures can be given. I am sorry, and I think it is most unfortunate, that there should be as many people as there are in the frame of mind which holds that everything is just as it ought to be and can not be improved upon, that we are living in a wonderful era of prosperity and surplusage. To sum up the whole matter, I would only say that I hope we can come to face the facts as they really exist to-day, and, in facing those facts, give them the consideration which they merit when we are acting upon the important legislation which is before us.

The entire question is pretty well summarized by the editor of a little paper published out in Pasadena, Calif., known as the American Atlas, in an open letter addressed to the President of the United States—and it might as well have been addressed to the Congress of the United States—in which he says this—

[From the American Atlas, Pasadena, Calif.]

PASADENA, CALIF.

President CALVIN COOLIDGE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Recently there were three holdups, one murder, two automobiles stolen in Pasadena, and I have just received word that an aqueduct has been blown up near here.

Inasmuch as our Nation has marines in China and Nicaragua to protect American lives and property, I ask that a troop of marines be stationed here in Pasadena for the same purpose.

The Standard Oil Co. has several stations and a depot here, which the marines could protect, making them feel entirely at home.

The schools of Los Angeles are forced to feed 3,000 starving children. May I have copies of your speech, in which you said that the farmers had raised too much foodstuffs? I would like to distribute this speech among these children.

If it is not asking too much, I would also like to have copies of Mr. Mellon's speech in which he announced that we were in the midst of a great wave of prosperity. I would like to distribute this speech among the parents of these 3,000 children. If you have any extra copies, please forward for distribution to the 80,000 unemployed of Los Angeles.

Yours for continued prosperity, less food, and more marines,

THE EDITOR.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the resolution under consideration was introduced by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MCMASTER], who comes from the very heart of the great agricultural section of this country—at least, from the heart of the grain-growing section. I have abundant reasons for knowing that the people of that section of the country are wedded to the principle of protection to American industries; and I have no doubt at all that the Senator who is the author of the resolution shares fully in the views of his constituents in relation to that particular subject.

I do not think the resolution as originally introduced was at all subject to the construction which seems to have been given to it in some quarters, namely, that it called for anything like a horizontal reduction of all the schedules or rates. It evidenced a desire for a revision of the tariff, and a study again of the schedules as they exist in the present law, with a view to reducing those that could be reduced with safety to industry.

The agriculturists of the country have abundant cause for the restiveness which they have exhibited and the discontent which prevails among them, evidenced by this resolution. Although a kindly Providence has favored the Northwest this year with abundant crops, the industry of agriculture is still carried on under a most decided disadvantage. Figures given me by the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture only a few days ago show that with respect to commodities generally the average prices have advanced from the standard of 100 between 1909 and 1913 to 151, while the prices of farm products generally have advanced only to 132. That is to say, while farm prices have risen on an average 32 per cent, the prices of commodities generally have gone up 51 per cent. So, Mr. President, the same quantity of agricultural products which in 1909 to 1913 would buy $100 worth of other goods will now buy but $86 worth of those goods.

It was really begging the question for the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the other day to discuss the question of the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar, saying that the farmer's dollar had exactly the same value as any other dollar. Of course, literally, that is true; but the expression very tersely indicates the idea now generally understood, that the farmer is operating under a disadvantage of at least 14 per cent as against other industries in this country—a disadvantage so oppressive as that any industry which labors under it must suffer from the severest depression, if, indeed, it is not headed for bankruptcy. It presents a problem of so serious a nature that it has always been a matter of astonishment to me that those Representatives who come from the industrial section of the country exhibit so much indifference with respect to it.

It is retorted, however, that the farmer is protected by duties upon most, or at least many, of his products. Even the item of wheat is referred to in this connection, and the farmer is told that he has a tariff of 42 per cent upon the production of wheat. The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], in the course of his remarks on Tuesday, quite frankly admitted that with respect to any of these agricultural products, of which we produce a surplus, which must find a foreign market, the tariff is almost altogether entirely ineffective.

Indeed, Mr. President, that principle is the basis of the so-called McNary-Haugen bill. If the tariff upon agricultural products, and particularly on wheat, were effective, there would be no occasion for the relief which it is sought to secure by that legislation. By consulting the reports upon that measure in both branches of the Congress it will be found that it is there stated that to a large extent the tariff upon agricultural products is ineffective, and that gives occasion for the legislation.

My esteemed friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], in the course of some remarks a few days ago, told us that the Canadian farmer is now getting for his wheat 25 cents a bushel more than the American farmer receives, or thereabouts, notwithstanding the tariff. I do not find the statement to be supported by the figures given me by the Department of Agriculture, but it is true that the tariff upon wheat is, as shown by a comparison of the prices in Winnipeg and Minneapolis, without any value whatever to the farmer. I find, for instance, that during the months of September, October, and November, during which the very largest proportion of the wheat produced in the Northwest finds the market, the price was practically the same in both of these markets. There has been a little spread in the month of December, but of no very great consequence. For instance, the average price of No. 1 hard dark northern spring in the month of September was $1.44 in Minneapolis. In Winnipeg the same No. 1 hard dark northern spring was $1.45. During the month of October the No. 1 hard dark northern spring was $1.45 in Minneapolis, and in Winnipeg it was $1.44. During the month of November the average price of No. 1 hard dark northern in Minneapolis was $1.43, and in Winnipeg it was $1.45. In the month of December the average price of No. 1 hard dark northern spring in Minneapolis was $1.48, and in the month of December in Winnipeg the average price was $1.40.

That was not only the condition during the season just passed, during the year 1927, but the prices were practically the same during the preceding year, 1926; and on the day on which the Senator spoke, the 13th, the spread between Minneapolis and Winnipeg was a matter of 6 cents, the price in Minneapolis being $1.43 and in Winnipeg $1.49.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. My quotations were taken from the daily quotations in the Chicago Tribune, which showed that on September 8 No. 1 northern in Minneapolis was $1.33 to $1.38, and in Winnipeg $1.52⅜, a spread of 14⅜ cents. On November 16 the same grade is reported in the Chicago Tribune as selling for $1.24 to $1.30 in Minneapolis, and for $1.50⅞ at Winnipeg, making a spread of 20 cents. In the meantime the Canadian Railway Commission, on the 12th of September, had lowered the freight rates on wheat to the seaboard points. So I think when we get it figured out on the actual grades, wheat was a little higher at Winnipeg than at Minneapolis, taking the same grade.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Iowa and I will no doubt agree, at least, that so far as the marketing of the great bulk of the wheat raised in the Northwest is concerned, the tariff is utterly ineffective.

Mr. BROOKHART. We agree absolutely on that proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the retort that the farmer is protected by a tariff on his products as well as the manufacturer has very, very little force.

Those who were here when the tariff bill of 1922 was under consideration will recall very well that both Senator Penrose, who had it in charge in the early stages, and Senator McCumber, who took charge of it later on, declared that the conditions at that time were so variable in character, changing with the changing of the hours, that it was next to impossible, if it was not entirely impossible, to arrive at any rate which could be really justified. They said that a rate which would be entirely adequate to-day, by reason of the changing conditions, would be found entirely too high to-morrow, and that a rate which was adequate to-day would be found entirely inadequate to-morrow, by reason of the change in conditions through which we were going at that time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator will recall, doubtless, that during the pendency of the bill changes of rates were brought in by the committee, based upon the fact that changes had taken place in the economic world within a few days which necessitated changes in rates.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so. So that these gentlemen, in the presentation of this bill to the Senate, frankly admitted that with respect to many of these schedules the rates were placed so high as to meet any conditions that might arise, and then they inserted the so-called flexible provisions of the bill, in order that the excesses might be corrected, or, if inadequacy should be shown, that the rates might be raised.

Particularly at that time, it will be recalled, the German mark had fallen in value so that the payments to German laborers in marks had fallen to the very lowest possible limit; and it was represented that because the Germans were able to get labor at so low a figure, due to the depreciation of the mark, American manufacturers were likely to be driven entirely out of business by the competition likely to ensue from Germany; and there was very much force in the argument. But, of course, since that time things have undergone all manner of change, not only in Germany but in all the countries of Europe where the monetary systems have been stabilized, and some of them have gone to the gold standard. It is because of these conditions that there is a demand quite general throughout the country, reflected in the resolution which is now under consideration, for a revision of these schedules. Anyone who will attempt to recall the conditions under which this law came into effect will, I believe, be surprised that five years have gone by—almost six years—without the change which it was expected would be effected in these schedules within a very brief time after the law came into force.

What is the answer that is made to this demand for a revision of these schedules that were adopted under those conditions? It is suggested that somebody wants to destroy the whole protective system; that the American farmers' American market is to be entirely surrendered, as though it were proposed by anybody to wipe out all customs duties entirely, protective or otherwise, and go on an absolute basis of entire free trade. That is a perfect evasion of the question as to whether the time has not come when many of these schedules ought to be revised, in view of the changed conditions which have ensued.

Not a little has been said thus far, Mr. President, about the duties upon aluminum. Having given some little consideration to that particular item, not only when the tariff bill of 1922 was under consideration but since then, I feel that I might be able to shed a little light upon the advisability of an immediate revision at least in that particular schedule.

The duty on crude aluminum ingots or pigs was raised from 2 cents, as it was under the Underwood-Simmons law, to 5 cents, and upon sheets and coils from 3½ cents to 9 cents. Let us see what was the operation of that change in the law.

The Federal Trade Commission having given to this subject a very careful study, tells us as follows. I read now from page 89 of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the house-furnishing industry, submitted to the Senate in the year 1925:
